KEEPS LONELY VIGIL.

LIGHTHOUSE MAN HAS WORRY AND RESPONSIBILITY.

Works Amid Deep Solitude and Must Endure All Sorts of Weather—Place an Appointive One and Free from Wiles of Politicians.

The keeper of a marine lighthouse has not a job, but an office. He is a Presidential appointee and holds a commission which when read out sounds as important as that of the collector of customs or the postmaster. He holds an office of large trust and high responsibility. He is to keep his lamp trimmed and burning from the dusk of evening till the next daylight. His post is advanced to the edge of the deep and often raging waters—it is a lonely situation and through nights of all weathers he must stay and be vigilant at his post. Should he fail once in the performance of duty what disaster to vessels and crews might not come! The navigator knows and testifies to his worth in the position where he has been placed by the government, but it is certain that he is not much regarded by the general public.

LONELY WATCH OF THE LIGHTKEEPER.

The first lighthouse in the Chicago harbor, says the Chronicle, if it could be so denominated, when the smallest vessels made their way with peril into the shallow mouth of the unimproved river, was erected in 1831. Reckoning from that date, which, in fact, was six years earlier than the city's birth as a corporation, the vast commece now carried on here had its beginning only sixty-nine years ago. There is nothing like this commercial wonder in the world now, nor ever was. All this since an immense number of men still living and not yet accounted old were born!

When it first was in agitation to erect a lighthouse here of the old pattern, with a stationary light of no great power, there was a man in France deep in studies and busy with experiments to produce a marine light on a new principle that should take the place of every other the world round. Fresnel was that man. Indeed, he began with his experiments ten years earlier. Over in France was Fresnel at work on a marine light that was destined to send its aprising flashes from six several towers in the Chicago harbor over the waters to the horizon. The Frenchman lived to perfect his light; he was appointed secretary to the lighthouse board of France in 1825 and while he was in that position he replaced reflectors with lenses and invented the revolving light. Then he added prismatic rings. The result was the system that still goes by his name and has long since changed the mode of lighthouse illumination throughout the world. It is now used exclusively by the United States.

Chicago people are accustomed to seeing the Fresnel light in the several lighthouses in the harbor, but probably few have ever inquired into the mechanism of the apparatus by which the flashes are produced. Take the one on the north pier as typical. Within it is an arrangement of lenses, supplemented by prisms, which revolve around a sperm oil-burning lamp. When one of the lenses comes opposite the observer the eye receives a bright flash preceded and followed by a brief eclipse. There are six orders of lenses, arranged according to size. The first three and largest are used in seacoast lights, and the last three in harbor and river lights. The lamp differs from other lamps in the provision of wicks. Carcel invented a lamp which is named for him, in which oil is fed to the wick by means of a pump, operated by clockwork, sometimes used in lighthouses and as a domestic lamp. Fresnel adopted the Carcel lamp, but improved it so that it pumps up to the burner four times as much oil as is consumed, which, by keeping the burners cool, prevents them from melting and also the wicks from burning up. Sometimes a wick will burn a whole night without requiring snuffing. This, notwithstanding the fact that the intensity of the Fresnel light is about equal to that of about twenty-five ordinary Carcel burners. The above description applies to the first order of lenses, which are used in the great lights on the seacoast. For the second order of lenses, such as used in the lights in the Chicago harbor, a lamp with three concentric wicks was adopted. The annual consumption of oil by the lenses of the first order is 694 gallons and of the second order 461 gallons. The lenses cost but little more than the old reflectors and the saving of oil is great. The ratio of effect of the lens light is to that of the reflector light as 4 to 1—that is, one gallon of oil burned in a lens throws as much light to the horizon as four gallons burned in a reflector light.

During the last twenty-five years there has been a great increase in marine lighting in the ninth lighthouse district, which includes Minnesota, Michigan, Indiana, Wisconsin and Illinois. The number of lighthouses in this district is 127, and every light is a Fresnel. A new lighthouse built at Manitou Island is fine, costing the government a good sum of money. Beside it is the fog signal contriyance and a little distance off is the oil tank inclosed neatly. The house in which the lighthouse keeper dwells is supplied with the modern conveniences and is handsome enough to be called a villa. A large quantity of stores is required to be kept constantly in the district, and these are substantially housed in a government building in St. Joseph, Mich.

The official headquarters of the ninth district is in Chicago. It is in charge of Commander F. M. Symonds, United States navy. Commander Symonds says that the Chicago lighthouses are reckoned among the best on the lakes.

HOT RACE WITH A GRIZZLY.

Lively Experience of a Colorado Postmaster with a Bear.

W. H. Person, local manager of a typewriter company, received a letter this morning from Tom Hamilton, postmaster at Hamilton, Routt County, describing a thrilling race with a bear which he enjoyed this week.

The bear was a big grizzly. The grizzly when he sees a human form is bound to do one of two things. He will either run at or away from the stranger, and if he does the former it is generally a case of doughnuts to pretzels that it is all off with the stranger. In this case the bear that runs at a man yearned for a closer acquaintance with the postmaster and would probably have interfered seriously with the future delivery of the United States mail but for the fact that Hamilton is something of a rough rider and had a horse under him.

Postmaster Hamilton had for the time being left the affairs of state in the hands of a subordinate while he went out to round up some straying cattle. He went about three miles from home and was standing beside his horse wondering which way to turn next when there was a stir in some brush ahead of him. It looked too small a disturbance for a cow, but he thought it might be a calf and went forward to investigate. He was within a few feet of the brush when a big grizzly stood on its hind legs and threw him a kiss.

Hamilton didn't stop to catch the kiss, but made a bolt for his horse. The steed had seen Mr. Bear and started away almost as eagerly as did his master, and it was nip and tuck for the saddle between bruin and the postmaster. After a run of 100 yards Hamilton caught the pommel of the saddle and threw himself aboard just as the bear made a bound for him. A pair of spurs went into the horse's hide and the animal leaped forward with a bound which made the bear feel that his meal of man was apt to escape. But he doubled himself up into a ball of fury and started red-hot after his intended victim. The chase kept up until the door of the postmaster's cabin was reached, when bruin turned about and made for the woods. He was allowed to escape.—Denver Times.

Risked His Life in a Canoe.

A young Frenchman named Felix Chauchois, a Parisian student, about 25 years of age, was given an enthusiastic reception on the sands at Calais upon his reaching shore after an adventurous voyage across the channel from Dover in a small canoe.

M. Chauchois, who had been staying at Dover, left the English shore on Sunday morning at 8 o'clock in a canoe belonging to the Dover Rowing Club, of which he was a temporary member. It is an exceedingly frail craft, measuring about 14 feet in length and 2 feet wide, covered at both ends. The well in which the canoeist sat is 3 feet long by about 20 inches wide. She was in the same condition when he started as when used for ordinary pleasure purposes, the only protection he had to keep the water out being the ordinary weather boards.

There was a light northwesterly wind as he started from Dover, but later in the day the wind veered to southwest and freshened, and there was quite an unpleasant ripple on the water. Chauchois was at first carried away on the flood tide a good deal to the eastward, but he had the advantage of having his course for Calais given him by Captain Delahaye of the cross-channel mail packet Le Nord. It appears, however, that he drifted many miles out of his course, as the tide turned westward, and it was not until 10:30 on Monday that he reached Calais. He was unaccompanied throughout the passage.—London Chronicle.

ALL ONE CONTINENT.

This map shows the formation of the land which scientists now affirm connected Australia, Africa and America, making of the three one great antarctic continent. For proof of this the fact is pointed out that the ancient sea beaches of Patagonia, which are now far inland, have imbedded in them fossil shells which are exactly like those found in parts of Australia. It is probably more than 1,000,000 years ago that the continuous coastline of both continents became divided.

The fauna of the three countries are beyond doubt descendants from the same ancestors, for it is absurd to assume that there could at one time have been a land bridge across the great expanses of ocean; or that there can ever have been migration by means of drifting wood.

The ostrich is cited as another proof. It is found both in Australia and Africa, but is, nevertheless, a non-flying bird. But it is more particularly among extinct animals, whose remains are from time to time unearthed, that investigators have been able to establish their theory beyond doubt.

Now, the discovery of an antarctic continent is looked forward to with more importance by scientists than the discovery of the north pole.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS.

THIS IS THEIR DEPARTMENT OF THE PAPER.

Quaint Sayings and Cute Doings of the Little Folks Everywhere, Gathered and Printed Here for All Other Little Ones to Read.

"Oh, dear, how I do hate work!" said Lily.

"Have you got much to do, dearie" asked her grandmother, gently.

"All that!" replied Lily, holding out a long seam with a dismal sigh. "Oh, do, granny, tell me about yourself when you were little."

"Well, your dislike of needlework reminds me very much of my own childhood. You know it was not the fashion then for girls to play games as you do now, and I often got into sad scrapes for running and climbing with my brothers instead of sitting quietly at my needle. One day my mother spoke seriously to me and said I would never be a useful woman unless I tried to learn a little more, which made me cry and promise to do my best. Finally, she kissed me and promised that when I should have finished a set of shirts which I was then making, she would give me a gold thimble of her own. I really did try very hard; and at last the shirts were finished and I went triumphantly to claim my prize.

"'Yes, you deserve it,' said mother, when I put it on. 'But be careful where you keep it.' I promised and flew to the schoolroom to put away my work, when one of the boys called out that they were going for a walk. Down went my work and new thimble on the table and out I ran to join them. We had a delightful ramble, and on our return I went to the schoolroom, to find my work there, but not the thimble. High and low I searched, but it was gone. In terrible trouble, I went to the boys (not daring to confess to mamma), and we hunted everywhere together, but in vain. Suddenly Alfred looked out of the window. 'Look at old Jack,' he said. 'What has he got there?' We had a tame crow, who used to live in the garden, and was now hopping over the lawn with something glittering in his beak.

"'My thimble!' I cried, springing through the window; and we both raced after the naughty bird, but too late. With a wicked croak of triumph he flew toward the pond at the bottom of the garden and dropped the precious prize into the water.

"'O, you dreadful bird!' I cried, and fairly burst into tears. 'Never mind, old girl!' said Alfred. And in a twinkling he had tucked up his trousers and waded in. It was shallow just there; and, to my relief, he spied the thimble, where it had lodged against a stone, and restored it to me.

"Dear old boy! I love it for the memory of that bit of help!" And granny drew the thimble from a case, where it rested in company with an old, faded photograph. "I couldn't part with it now; but some day you shall have it, Lily."

More Play Needed.

It used to be that boys and men who worked had shorter working hours and less work to do in the same time than do the men and boys of to-day. Consequently they had better opportunities and greater inclination for recreation of the healthiest kind. They felt able to rise in the morning early enough for gymnastics, their work the day before not being so irksome as to make them feel they needed every moment of sleep possible, as is often the case nowadays, and in the late afternoons and evenings they could enjoy an athletic game. The girls some years ago exerted themselves mentally and physically much less than they do now, their course of study usually being mild in comparison to the average of to-day, and few of them were in business or the professions. Therefore their need was less for strengthening exercises.

Although the mental and physical work that the men and women of this generation do has greatly increased they do not seem to have realized yet that a counteracting force is absolutely necessary, for the number is growing larger every day. We cannot help observing it on the streets and everywhere—of men and women who slouch along with drooping figure and dragging steps, the picture of undeveloped physical manhood and womanhood.

There is nothing more pleasant to look upon than a strong, graceful, happy young man or young woman, and the last two qualities depend on the first and all three on physical exercises and development.

Therefore, boys and girls, you know what you must do to be happy and attractive, and it is your duty to be all three. You can, of course, in varying degree, and you ought to add much to the beauty of this old world, whose fine men and women are its most splendid features.

A Hard Word to Say.

In the heat of passion Robert had done something that he was ashamed of and sorry for after the excitement had passed away. "I wish that I hadn't let my temper get away with my good sense," he said; "but it's done and can't be undone."

"But isn't there a way to overcome the effect of wrong doing to a great extent?" asked a voice in his heart.

"How?" asked Robert.

"By owning to one's blame in the matter," answered the voice. "Confessing one's fault does much to set wrong right. Try it."

Now, Robert was very much like the rest of us—he hated to admit that he was in fault. "I'm wrong; forgive me," is a hard thing to say. But the more he thought the matter over the more he felt that he ought to say just that. "It's the right thing to do," he told himself. "If I know what's right and don't do it I'm a moral coward. I'll do it." So he went to the one that he had wronged and confessed his fault frankly and the result was that the two boys were better friends than before and his comrade had a greater respect for him.—Exchange.

A Word or So About Opportunity.

There is an old saying that opportunity is kind, but only to the industrious. As an illustration of this idea we may cite the old Perisan legend that a poor man waited a thousand years at the gates of paradise hoping that they would open and he could enter. Finally he snatched one little nap of a few minutes' duration, but then it was that the gates opened—and shut. Von Moltke, the triumphant strategist of the Franco-Prussian war, said:

"To win you must be at the right place at the right time, with a superior force."

The great Napoleon made that the active principle of his marvelous military career. The rule holds good in all the pursuits of life.

Mamma's Mistaken Policy.

"Mamma," said 3-year-old Flossie, "I guess you don't know much about raising children, do you?"

"Why do you think that?" asked the mother.

"Because," replied the little miss, "you always send me to bed when I'm not sleepy and make me get up when I am sleepy."

A Queer Alaskan Fish.

In Alaska there is a queer fish that can be used as a candle when dried. The tail of the fish is stuck in a crack of a wooden table and its nose is lighted. A good-sized flame will burn about three hours. It gives a good, steady light of three-candle power and considerable heat.

Ferment in a New Sense.

A little schoolgirl was told by her teacher to write the word "ferment" on her slate, together with the definition and a sentence in which the word was to be used. The following is the result:

"F-e-r-m-e-n-t; a verb, signifying to work. I love to do all kinds of fancy ferment."

A Bright Boy's Retort.

"Tell me where the Lord is, my little man," said the minister to a bright little fellow, "and I'll give you a penny."

"You tell me where he isn't," replied the youthful philosopher, "and I'll give you two pennies."

DANGER FROM OVEREATING.

Insanity Is Often Caused by a Too Liberal Indulgence in Food.

It is well known to the few medical men that many cases of insanity are directly due to overeating and the consequent absorption into the circulation of toxic matters from the intestinal tract; and melancholia, whether in mild or severe form, is generally due to this cause. Violent paroxysms of temper, whether in children or adults, are often properly referable to a bad state of the blood from this auto-toxemia, as is, indeed, the exceedingly exuberant spirits of old or young at times; just as we observe in alcoholic poisoning, some individuals are made temporarily jolly and good natured; others are made ugly and unreasonable. In view of this condition of affairs isn't it rather a wise plan for us all to consider rather the needs of the organism for food than the mere question of palate-tickling; to aim to eat good instead of bad food and enough of it—that is, not too much; to have the conditions about right when we take our meals; in brief, to try and treat our bodies decently, even though we act from a purely sensual point of view? In no other way can we secure the highest possible degree of pleasure on the average, while by acting thus sensibly we may enjoy practical immunity from disease.

The more exercise we take under proper conditions, the more we are exposed to cold and the cleaner we keep from excess in clothing the more we may eat; hence, in order to enjoy the fullest measure of table pleasures we must live actively, wear as little clothing as is consistent with comfort and do considerable "roughing"—sometimes called hardening. With all this we should take our meals at times when the body or brain is not overtired and when we "have leisure to digest." And, of all things, we should never eat unless we are hungry; to eat without an appetite is self-abuse of the most stupid sort, since it affords no pleasure and is productive of disease.

An Illiterate Country.

Roumania would appear to be the most illiterate country in Europe. The last census shows that, in a population of about 6,000,000 nearly 4,000,000 can neither read nor write, and that only a little over 1,000,000 have any education at all.

A physician says a man should never do any work before breakfast. Of course this doesn't apply to the tramp who is compelled to work for some one for his breakfast.

LAW SETS WASH DAY.

CHICAGO JUDGE RENDERS DECISION IN QUARREL.

Decides on What Day Flat Occupants Shall Cleanse the Family Linen—Housekeepers Must Wash on the Days Allotted to Them.

Strange as it may seem, the Chicago Woman's Club has never discussed the problem of wash day in an apartment building; neither has the West End Woman's Club, nor the Arche Club, nor, so far as anyone can find out, has any woman's club of the city. It is a rare occurrence that a matter comes before the public mind which has not previously been considered by the woman's club. It is seldom that women are forced to go outside the authority of their organizations for a solution of any really weighty problem. There can be no doubt that concerning the regulation of wash day the clubs have been negligent. They have had mothers' meetings, they have given their best thought to the solution of social problems, they have dabbled in domestic affairs to the extent of the servant question. Why they should have so neglected the problem of wash-day rights no one can say—it is enough that they have, and that but for the timely intervention of the judiciary serious things might have happened.

It was Judge Tuthill who was brave enough to attempt a settlement of the matter. The wash-day litigation has reached a successful termination, and the public is agreed that no greater service has been rendered by the courts of Illinois. All America will look to Judge Tuthill's decision for authority in arranging wash days, and the world cannot but be influenced by its message of domestic peace. It marks the passing of the Monday wash-day, opening a new epoch, which, influenced by the strenuous life of the times, will have seven wash days instead of one.

There can be no argument as to which wash-day belongs to whom. Judge Tuthill has read the law on that question, and occupants of apartments must consider the wash-day regulations before renting their flat. According to the decree, the mater stands: First flat wash day, Monday; second flat wash day, Tuesday; third flat wash day, Wednesday; fourth flat wash day, Thursday, and so on until the seventh flat is reached, when, so the decree reads, a new laundry shall be established. It is so planned that every six flats shall share a laundry, taking it day by day in turn, so that no two families will expect to have the room on the same day, and so that no discussion can arise as to which day the laundry belongs to which family.

The case that brought the matter to a focus in the courts was that of a family living in the third flat of a building on Woodlawn avenue. The family in question was more forehanded than its neighbors, and thought to get soapsuds and ill-tempers out of the way before the middle of the week. Wednesday was its allotted day for the laundry, but, nothing daunted, the family housekeeper set her clothes a-soak Monday night, with the intention of washing on Tuesday. Early Tuesday morning she was busy over the tubs, when the family from the second flat—a mother and two sturdy daughters—invaded the basement. The discussion which followed was a trying one, and but for the timely intervention of the janitor might have resulted no one knows how seriously.

Now, as luck would have it, the janitor, man fashion, was unconscious of wash-day trials and tempers. The matron of the third flat had taken to the tubs first, and by right of possession they belonged to her. So, at least, the janitor decided, never thinking that in breaking one of the rules of the establishment he was laying himself open to litigation.

The family of the second flat were great "sticklers" for rules. They knew the right of the laundry was theirs for the day, and, whether or not, they had no intention of being trampled on by the people from the flat overhead.

Beisdes that, they were persevering people and fond of argument, and would not let so good an opportunity pass.

Judge Tuthill has presided over the recreant masses these many years with never an opportunity for so distinguishing himself as he has done in the wash-day decision. He has never hesitated to mete out justice even of the sternest sort; he has never faltered in the doing of his duty, but it must be remembered that duty never came to him with so many perplexing complications as this of the wash-tubs brought. If he quailed before the stern facts as they were presented by the two chief witnesses, if he hesitated in choosing between the rights of the two sides of the case, no one will ever know. Wisely he kept his peace and, advising with no one, with his duty ever before him, he chose to emphasize the rule which has been held in many apartment houses, and which the better judgment of every thinking person will commend. It is now no longer a rule, but a law, unwritten, yet forceful nevertheless to hold every top flat occupant to her week's end wash day.

As for the women's clubs, it is too bad they did not "get in" on this discussion before the question was settled. As it is, one of the North Side clubs has decided to talk about it next week, and if possible to find some excuse for the action of the woman from the third flat, who has, in their estimation, been unjustly set upon throughout the trial. If such a decision is not possible, the club may decide to send her a testimonial of sympathetic sisterhood, expressing the trust that she will be resigned to retarded housework and midweek washings. Perhaps later in the year the Chicago club may undertake to throw further light upon the distressing domestic situation of the woman who occupies the third flat.—Chicago Chronicle.

COMMON LAW PROTECTS WASH DAY.

The Resources of Siberia.

Under government encouragement it is said that Siberia is gaining 200,000 farmers per year. Among its exports are cereals, butter, wool, leather and dried and preserved meats. Already this remote country, which the popular imagination is apt to picture as a vast waste, the abode of frost and snow, and misery, is becoming talked of as a possible competitor with the well-known cereal-producing countries of the world. A member of the French bureau of foreign commerce estimates that, on the basis of the present population of Russia in Europe, Siberia can sustain 80,000,000 inhabitants, although it now has not one-tenth of that number. It produces one-tenth of the world's yield of gold, but owing to climatic obstacles many of its mines are not worked, and its immense coal deposits have hardly been touched.

Does Cooking Spoil Food?

Prof. B. Tyler, of Indianapolis, says that human life would average three or four times longer than it does if people would reject the senseless practice of cooking their food. Animals and fowl live much longer in proportion to the period of full development than man. Says Prof. Tyler: "Man, for some unknown reason, eats dead cells (cooked cells) to replace the dead cells that have been separated from the body. In cooking food all the acids and gases so necessary for the conservation and preservation of ideal health escape with the steam, and the food retains a greater supply of ash, lime and other such substances than nature requires for the amount of food taken into the system."

Good Stories of a Bishop.

Many anecdotes were told of Bishop Williams of Connecticut, after his death, for the good bishop was as well known for his love of fun as for his earnest piety.

At a meeting of the bishops a measure was proposed and explained by its orginator, but with such incoherence that nobody understood it. A second speaker essayed to make the matter clear, but only darkened it. When he had finished Bishop Benjamin Smith of Kentucky tried to explain the question and also the explanations. Feeling that he had failed, he said:

"Bishop Williams smiles. What has he to say about it?"

"Only this," said the old bishop, "that 'the mess of Benjamin was found to be greater than the mess of any of his brethren.' "

"The humor of Dr. Williams," says a friend, "was always present and ready like the flash of sunlight. It had one peculiarity, it never scorched nor left a scar behind."

At an assemblage of noted men, a lawyer who conducts the legal business of a great railway system tried to "guy the parson" by malicious quizzing. At last he said: "Why don't you get these railway managers to give you a pass over their roads, bishop? You can pay for it by giving them entrance tickets into heaven."

"Oh, no!" gently replied the bishop. "I would not part them so far from their counsel in the other world."

The laugh was general, and the lawyer concluded to "let the parson alone."—Youth's Companion.

The Shape of an Anæsthetic.

It is a Bath physician who tells the following:

"Some time ago I happened to spend the night in a country town not far from Bath, and it happened that there was stopping at the same hotel an itinerant eye specialist.

"We drifted into a conversation, and during the course of the evening he told me of some of the marvelous operations he had performed on the eye. One case in particular he spoke of that caused me considerable astonishment, for I didn't know, I confess, that the operation had been successfully performed. He said he had recently taken out a patient's eye, scraped the back of it and returned it to its proper place. The patient, he said, was never troubled by bad eyesight afterward.

"That was a difficult operation, doctor," said I.

"Yes," said he, "it was."

"I suppose you found it necessary to employ an anæsthetic?"

"Yes, I did," he admitted.

"What anæsthetic did you use, doctor?" I persisted.

"Oh, well, unless you are familiar with such operations, you probably wouldn't understand if I were to tell you. But—well, it was shaped something like a spoon," explained the eminent specialist.—Lewiston Journal.

A Smart Boy.

A good story is told of the crown prince of Germany. Soon after Bismarck's retirement the emperor and empress were at dinner with their elder children and some eminent statesmen when the prince suddenly broke out with:

Japanese children write better with the left hand, while with the right hand they can turn out 10 per cent more work in a given time.

THE LISTENER.

The late George Muller, the philanthropist, of Bristol, England, left an estate valued at $800.

Obadiah Sands of Chicago is known as the "butter king." He owns 80 creameries and controls as many more.

Colonel Tom Ochiltree, so long a familiar figure in the corridors and bar of the Hotel Waldorf, in New York, has gone to Europe for his health.

Of the ten soldier presidents of the United States whose services in that office cover practically 40 years of the existence of the republic William McKinley is the first to call the nation to arms.

Lord Waldegrave, captain of that ancient corps known as "Her Majesty's Yeomen of the Guard," has been transformed into one of the wealthiest peers in the kingdom by the death of Lord Carlingford. He is very popular.

Captain Charles Weaver of an Arkansas company wears a sword that was first carried by his great-great-grandfather in the Revolutionary war, again by his great-grandfather in the war of 1812 and next by his uncle in the rebellion.

M. Deibler, Jr., son of the French public executioner, was lately married to a young lady once a cigar maker in a government factory. Young Deibler is now an assistant at executions and hopes some time to succeed his father in his grewsome office.

Colonel Robert H. Crockett, a grandson of the famous pioneer and patriot, "Davy" Crockett, is a typical southern gentleman of the old school. He is of medium height, with white hair and beard and stands as straight as an arrow, although he is now 70 years of age.

B. L. Stevens of Atlantic City, who was a gunner under the brave Dewey when the latter was a lieutenant on the Mississippi at New Orleans, in 1862, says that Dewey directed the shot which put the Manassas out of the fight and that he showed wonderful nerve in the battle.

Charles Boone, who has been appointed as a naval cadet at Annapolis, has supported himself and his mother and gained a good education by selling papers in Dayton, O., and was the only one of 50 applicants for the appointment who did not have recommendations from wealthy men.

The will of the Rev. Horace S. Bishop, rector emeritus of Christ Episcopal church, East Orange, N. Y., contains a bequest of $2,000, the income of which is to be used to supply altar lights and incense for the parish church. Mr. Bishop in his lifetime was never classed among the ritualistic clergy of the Episcopal church.

The father of the French chamber, M. Henri de Lacretelle, who is 88 years of age, is retiring from parliamentary life. He has represented Macon, but recently became so infirm that he had to be carried in and out of the chamber and appeared to be perfectly indifferent to the speeches and scenes which went on around.

THE PAINTERS.

The late Aubrey Beardsley is said to have done his best work at night by candlelight.

Although 79 years of age, Rosa Bonheur, the great painter of animals, appears as active as ever so far as her work is concerned. She spends about five hours a day perched on a ladder in her studio.

William Haskell Coffin, whose remarkable picture, "Karma," attracted so much attention in Washington art circles not long ago, is only 20 years of age and is the son of a former assistant comptroller of the currency.

Mr. T. R. Lamont, who has just died in London from an attack of pneumonia, was the original of the Laird in "Trilby." He and Mr. Du Maurier had been fellow students. As an artist he devoted himself especially to water color, and he was long an associate of the Royal Water Color society.

Georges Montbard, the artist, was a communist rather more than a quarter of a century ago and could frequently be seen careering about the Latin quarter on horseback and girded with a huge saber. When the Versailles troops entered Paris, he fled to England, and has since prospered with his pencil.

Brief Mention.

The disease of cotton generally known as "cotton rust" are, according to Professor Anderson of South Carolina, not caused by a rust fungus, but are due to the cropping of the land year after year in cotton, and, as is well known, can often be remedied by adding kainit to the soil.

Spanish peanuts raised on a poor, sandy Alabama upland, which in the investigator's opinion would not have produced over 200 pounds of lint cotton per acre, worth from $10 to $12, gave profit at the rate of $18.34 per acre as forage for pigs. The expense of cultivating the peanuts was less than for a similar area of cotton and the soil was benefited by the manure and the peanut vines.

A Texas exchange says that whole trainloads of peas and beans come into that state every year from Kansas, Michigan, New York, California and other faraway states. Texas doesn't raise them, although it can. The wholesalers sell them to the local merchants, who sell them to the people at 50 times the cost of raising them.

A Southern Cultivator correspondent thinks it well to look to forest and stream for sources of income, as the demand for lumber, hard wood and staves is increasing and factories are coming south.

Plant Selling and Fruit Raising.

Apropos of systems of strawberry culture, a correspondent of Gardening remarks: Above all, do not allow the runners to set too thick in the row, unless you are in the plant business. Plant selling and fruit raising is not, as a rule, a desirable combination. Every spring we sell a few thousand plants from our narrow matted rows—dug along the edges—but it is done more as an accommodation to the neighbors than a money making scheme. Every time a plant is dug from such rows we feel that just so much fruit is being taken up, besides injuring the adjoining plant roots more or less. Whether the price obtained from this weeding out process offsets the loss and injury is a question in our minds, with a big letter Q. It is the writer's humble opinion that the operation comes more properly under the heading of charity than finance.

A Little Sermon.

To be honest; to be kind; to earn a little and spend a little less; to make, upon the whole, a family happier for his presence; to renounce, when that shall be necessary, and not be imbittered; to keep a few friends, but these without capitulation; above all, on the same grim condition, to keep friends with himself—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Mrs. E. McGranahan, Mrs. Oscar Hilton and Mrs. Mary E. Hilton came down from Bishop Wednesday, returning home Thursday.

Walter James, better known as Capt. Watt, who has been ill with pneumonia for several weeks past, is still in a critical condition.

Howard, son of O. I. Mairs, who has been seriously ill for a few days past with pneumonia, is reported somewhat better this morning.

Harry Floyd has hied him to Saline valley where he will barter with the native sons and daughters for baskets, bottles, bead work, etc. He already has some fine specimens of their handiwork.

Wells Barnes came in from his mine yesterday. He reports the development work done lately has opened up a large body of first-class ore. The work of taking out ore for shipment will commence in a few days.

The many friends of Mrs. A. Lamar, wife of Superior Judge Lamar, who has been so seriously ill at San Jose for some time past, will be pleased to learn that she is recovering as rapidly as can be expected and will return home as soon as she has gained sufficient strength to make the trip.

Silas Reynolds, the genial clerk of the Inyo Mercantile Co., is taking a vacation. He says he is going on a prospecting tour, but from indications it is apparent to us that he is on still hunt for a young lady to cast her lot with his and occupy the new building he has lately erected on his homestead. We hope he will find the lead and return with the prize he has so long sought after.

J. Sub Johnson and R. A. Whitley, of Visalia, arrived here last Friday evening and remained here until Wednesday afternoon, when they started for home going by way of Ballarat and Randsburg. Sub was kept busy shaking hands with his many friends in this vicinity who were pleased to welcome him. He informed us he was here for the purpose of looking after his mining interests? only this and nothing more? Mr. Whitley is a member of the Visalia Milling Co. Come again gentlemen.

Death of Augusta Kispert.

The sad news was received here Tuesday that Miss Augusta Kispert had passed away in Los Angeles after a long illness. The young lady contracted a severe cold at the Odd Fellows dance last April, which developed into consumption in a few weeks. She was removed to Los Angeles early in the Fall where it was hoped the change of climate would benefit her. But no improvement was noticed and there was a steady decline until death mercifully stepped in and put an end to her suffering. Her sister, Ida, was with her at the end, the mother being kept here at the bedside of the father who has been seriously ill for weeks past. The young lady was 15 years, 11 months and 28 days old, being the youngest child of Mr. and Mrs. John Kispert, of Georges Creek. The sympathy of the whole community is extended to the stricken family in their great bereavement.

The body is expected to arrive here Monday evening and the burial will probably take place Tuesday afternoon.

A Question of Intent.

The most popular man in a western town once got into difficulty with a disreputable tough, who was the terror of the place, and did it up in a manner entirely satisfactory to the entire community. It was necessary, however, to vindicate the majesty of the law, and the offender was brought up for trial on a charge of assault with intent to kill. The jury took the case and were out about two minutes, when they returned.

"Well," said the judge, in a familiar off-hand way, "what have the jury to say?"

"May it please the court," responded the foreman, "we, the jury, find that the prisoner is not guilty of hittin' with intent to kill, but simply to paralyze, and he done it."

The verdict was received with applause and the prisoner given an ovation.—Green Bag.

Items for Stockmen.

FRESNO, Cal., Dec. 18, 1900.

INYO INDEPENDENT:—Instructions from Washington show that practically the same rules will be in force for stock grazing on the Forest Reservation next season that were introduced last year. Permits will be granted upon application for the grazing of horses and cattle upon conditions stated in printed forms furnished by the Government.

Stockmen who failed to obtain permits last year should at once write the Superintendent at Fresno for application blanks.

To those who had permits last year blanks will be mailed for new application.

Truly yours,
CHARLES E. NEWHALL,
Forest Superintendent.

Snow Storm.

The cold weather of the past few days culminated this morning in a bountiful fall of the beautiful. The snow-storm which began at 3:50 a. m., was the greatest for several years. At 9 a. m. the average depth here was fully five inches. The snow is very moist and this means a greater amount of water than when dry. The precipitation for the season, including this storm, insures an abundance of water for the coming crops, probably above the average as the rainy season is not more than half over.

Mr. H. Levy, proprietor of the Independence Hotel, gave a New Year's supper to his boarders and numerous invited guests that could hardly be excelled for the numerous and tasteful dishes that were in evidence. It was a spread that could not help but please the most exacting, and all the guests did ample justice to the bountiful repast. The company voted Mr. Levy a royal entertainer and wished him many returns of the New Year.

THE MOUNTAINS.

The Tulare Register recently contained an editorial which purported to give the side of the sheep men in the controversy that has arisen relative to grazing in the mountains. This called forth a vigorous rejoinder from a gentleman in Visalia, in which many strong reasons were given why sheep should be excluded and the statement was also made that cattle should be kept out of the high Sierras. The Fresno Republican also contained an editorial Sunday on the same subject.

It is well that this question is up for discussion. It is something in which every irrigator in the vallley is deeply interested. As we have remarked before all the water that leaves the Sierras in this valley is appropriated and if the irrigable area is to be increased there are just two sources from which the water may come. The first is by preserving the water shed so that the snow and rain will go in the ground and come down gradually, and the second is by pumping. The youngest child in this valley will never live to see the day when the United States government will build reservoirs to irrigate land that is in private ownership, and the state and federal governments have parted title with all the land in this valley that is of any value. Some way may be devised by which ditch corporations may store water, and they may be aided by the federal and state governments in making surveys, but the money to build the reservoirs will have to be put up by the men who own the land to be watered.

It is of vital importance that the mountains be so used that the greatest amount of water can be kept there until needed in the valley. Much water goes to waste now because the country is bare and hard. We have seasons of abundance and seasons of drouth. It seems to be the concensus of opinion that this is brought about to a large extent because of the sheep that have until recent years had free range in the Sierras. The government has taken this view of the matter and the interior department has done everything in its power to keep the sheep out. Judge Wellborn has decided that the rules and regulations adopted are unconstitutional and it now becomes the duty of congress to act.

If the "Times" were asked to advise the sheep men it would say to them: "You are up against a public sentiment that it will be impossible to overcome. Many of you have so conducted your business as to merit the sympathy of the people, but there are more who have acted in such a way as to bring reproach upon those who have sought to do what was right. Some of you in good faith bought considerable land in the mountains when it was for sale, but the majority own no land, pay no taxes when it is possible to avoid it, and have thus created a prejudice among the people that it will be useless to fight. There is plenty of land in the valley where alfalfa can be grown and upon which sheep can be grazed to much better advantage than in the mountains. Reduce the size of your flocks and keep your sheep at home. The greatest question in California today is the reforestation of the mountains and the preservation of the forests we now have. The people in every section of the state are taking an active interest in this particular question, and among a very large majority of them the impression is firmly fixed that the greatest enemy to the work mapped out is sheep. You don't believe this, but that does not alter the situation. The wise man will look at things as they are and not what he wants them to be. Any organization to build up a sentiment in favor of permitting sheep in the mountains will inevitably have the effect of consolidating opposition to such a procedure. You have been kept out of the mountains for two years now and have had to make your arrangements accordingly. Accept the inevitable in good faith and when you get your business fixed so that you will not feel the need of a mountain range in summer you will be independent and the men who now feel it to be their duty to fight you will be your best friends."—Tulare Times.

Off for the Desert

The Herald states that there has scarcely ever been a time when it was so difficult to find mining men in Los Angeles than at present. This is due to the fact that there is a greater amount of prospecting and development work in progress than ever before in the history of the country. This boom in mining is partially due to the natural growth of the industry, but to a great extent it is directly traceable to a belief that the building of the Salt Lake road will bring into profitable production a great section of the country which has heretofore been out of touch with the world. A large portion of the energy now being put forth in the location of new mines is in what the various prospectors believe to be in the line of the road to be built. A good many different guesses are being made as to the route which the road will follow, but there are hundreds of miners who are doing their best to get in front of the surveyors.

As to the development work in progress, it is scattered over a great part of Southern California and Southwestern Nevada, and it ought to imply a large interest in the output of gold and copper, especially in the near future.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, BOSTON, MASS.

THE SECOND MARRIAGE.

Her soft brown eyes upgazing to his face
As through the aisle's one sunlight shaft they pass
With measured pace,
He, smiling at the lips, but not the eyes
That seem to gaze upon some form that flies
Faroff, cloud wrapped, alas!

"He is too young to live alone," we hear,
"This woman's fair as was the first, and then She's dead a year."
Ah, true, she's lain twelve months beneath the clay;
But, oh, poor ghost, she only dies today,
Yea, with the priest's amen!

"The new life clings as fondly as the old;"
"There's love in brown eyes as there was in blue;"
"The grave is cold;"
"The elm, you know, looks bare without a vine;"
But, ah, Death makes, when two souls intertwine,
No void place for the new!

"Yet this his first true flow'r of love may be;"
Oh, on the dead wife's grave why pour out gall?
Yet bitterly
I'll say, The dead is gone forever now,
And better love should garland this young brow
Than life be bloomless all.

Laughter and bells ring o'er the bridal train,
But through them sigh upon the love tuned ear
Low tones of pain.
Oh, haste and gaze into mine eyes, my wife,
Till soul tells soul that love is love for life
And life begins but here!

—Joseph I. C. Clarke in Criterion.

His Ignorance.

Tess—Oh, I like him well enough, but it's so hard to make him understand anything. Last night he asked me several times for a kiss, and I said, "No, no!" each time.

Jess—My goodness! I should think that was emphatic enough for any man.

Tess—It certainly should be for any one who knows that two negatives make a positive.—Philadelphia Press.

HE ASPIRED TO OFFICE.

And He Will Never Forget His First Lesson In Politics.

One Detroiter who hopes some day to be elected to the legislature jollies the reporters by saying that he used to be a member of the craft. One of them, who prefers evidence to bare assertion, asked the political aspirant all about it and extorted this reluctant explanation:

"Well, just between you and me, it was this way: My father ran a weekly paper down in Indiana, and it was the party organ in the county. When I got home from college, I made up my mind that I was about ripe to be the clerk of courts. The old gentleman told me that I was pretty raw, but he agreed to be my strategy board and said he reckoned he could pull me through if I'd obey orders and make no moves on my own responsibility. I can see now that he was a great general, but you know how heady a young fellow is before the world has bumped him a few times.

"So I put up what I thought was a great scheme and kept it from the governor. The truth is that I thought him just a little slow for my class. The man against me on the opposition ticket lived in another town, and we had never met. So I went over there, told him that I was a reporter from my father's paper and proceeded to get his plans for making the fight.

"We had a delightful talk for an hour, smoking his cigars and sampling the juice of the grape from his own vineyard. I was too tickled for words till I got about half way home. Then I'd liked to have gone into a faint. It just dawned upon me that my smooth host hadn't told me a confounded thing and had got out of me my campaign to the minutest details. I was beaten to a standstill, and the old gentleman advised me to move."—Detroit Free Press.

Mail Box Honesty.

"That naive trust in human honesty that one sees here is distinctly American," said an Englishman, pointing to a letter box. "I would like to see a continental business man lay packages and large envelopes on the top of the post boxes. They would be taken before the glue of the stamps was dry. There is another reason why we can't do that at home. Our dear old London fogs would wipe out the address in short order, and unless the collections were frequent the paper would be reduced to a pulp. A dry climate makes you Americans talk with a dreadful nasal accent, but it shows up your honesty."—New York Tribune.

Misapprehension.

A small boy the other day heard the couplet of a hymn which runs thus:

And satan trembles when he sees
The meekest saint upon his knees.

His pity was all for satan. "Why does satan let the saint sit upon his knees if it makes him tremble?"—Rochester Post-Express.

Boasters.

"D'ye notice onny change since ye was here before, sor?" asked the native guide at the lakes of Killarney.

"How do you know I was never here before?" asked the American tourist.

"Faith, sor, no man ever comes here thot hasn't been here before."—Philadelphia Record.

Feminine Thrift.

He—Have you done as I asked, Elsie, and saved some money this month?

She—Oh, yes. I spoke to the grocer and asked him not to send in his bill till next month.—Fliegende Blatter.

No Use For the Water.

"They tell a good many jokes about Kentucky colonels and their natural aversion to water," said a fat drummer in the hotel corridor the other night, "but the richest thing in that line I ever knew to come off in real life happened over in Alabama when old man Briggs was trying to sell his summer hotel. Briggs had a pretty piece of property in the Alabama highlands, and its star feature was a magnificent big spring that welled into a sort of basin and was as cold as ice all the year round. He had good prospects of making a popular resort out of the place, but he got the California fever and offered it at a sacrifice to a race horse man from Kentucky who had an idea that he was cut out for a landlord.

"The race horse man was a typical Kentucky colonel of the old school and a mighty fine fellow. He came down to look over the ground in person, and Briggs started out with him to point out the principal attractions. At last they came to the famous spring. 'This, colonel,' said Briggs, stopping at the edge of the basin and swelling with pride, 'is a wonderful natural reservoir of crystal pure water, inexhaustible in volume and ice cold in temperature. It is undoubtedly the finest spring in the south.'

"'Hum-m-m!' grunted the colonel, sizing up the bubbling pool. 'I reckon I'll have to have this hole filled up if we close our deal, Mr. Briggs.'

"'Filled up!' exclaimed Briggs in horror.

"'Yes, suh,' replied the colonel calmly. 'You see, I'm not a-calculatin on keeping any stock on the place.'"—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Her Sacrifice.

The Rev. Cyrus T. Brady says in his book of missionary reminiscences: "I was once preaching about missions, urging the congregation to make some sacrifice for the missionary cause and indicating to them several methods by which they could follow my advice. Among other things I suggested that they refrain from purchasing any book which they very much desired and donate the money to me instead for my missionary work. I happened to have perpetrated a book myself.

"You will therefore understand my feelings when a very bright woman in the congregation came up to me and handed me $1 with the remark, 'I had intended to buy your book and read it, Mr. Brady, but I have concluded to follow your advice and give you the money for missions instead.'

"I accepted the situation gracefully and told her I would lend her my own copy of the book to read. She smiled and thanked me, and as she did so I voiced my thought in this way, 'But after all Mrs. R., there does not seem to be any sacrifice on your part in this transaction, for you have the happy consciousness of having given the money for missions and yet have the book as well.'

"'No sacrifice?' she replied. 'Why, I have to read the book!'"

Appropriate Shades.

A party of Americans were sitting on the upper deck of a Rhine river boat enjoying the charming scenery. One was reading aloud from a guidebook about the various castles as they came into view. Just as the boat was passing one of the finest old buildings a woman in the party exclaimed to her companions: "Why, that old castle is inhabited. See, there are blinds at the windows."

"No," said a man standing by her side; "those are the shades of their ancestors."

SALT WATER BLOOD.

An Operation That Is the Saving of Many Human Lives.

Transfusion of blood is a procedure that must have been employed by physicians in very early times. Ovid tells of Medea bringing back youth to the aged by the injection into their veins of the blood of young men, and doubtless the same means was employed by physicians for less fantastic objects. The injection of the blood of one person into the veins of another was until recently done to save life after severe hemorrhage and in various forms of blood poisoning. Sometimes a direct communication was made between the veins of the donor and of the recipient by means of a tube. At other times the healthy subject was bled into a bowl and the blood was beaten to remove the fibrin before it was passed into the blood vessels of the patient.

The procedure is a dangerous one, however, although many lives have been saved by it, and it has now been almost entirely abandoned, a much safer plan being used.

It is found that the blood when defibrinated is no longer a living fluid, and the corpuscles it contains serve no useful purpose when injected, but rather act as foreign matter which must be got rid of. Accordingly physicians now use distilled water in which a definite proportion of common salt and other chlorides have been dissolved. This solution is warmed and is injected slowly into a vein at the bend of the elbow, about a quart being used.

Often it is not even necessary to pour the fluid into a vein, but simply to inject it through one or more hollow needles into the tissues beneath the skin of the abdomen or the thigh.

This is done not only to supply an equivalent for fluid lost in hemorrhage or cholera, but also in certain diseases in which blood poisoning exists. In this latter case a large amount of fluid is injected slowly, and being taken up by the blood is almost immediately excreted through the kidneys, carrying with it much of the poison which the blood was unable to rid itself of unaided.

This operation has been felicitously called "blood washing," for this is what it really is, and to the process humanity owes the saving of many lives.—Youth's Companion.

Serious Accident

Befalls an Indiana Farmer—An Old Trouble Aggravated Which Causes Severe Suffering.

From the Democrat, Goshen, Ind.

Gilbert Updegraff, a prosperous farmer living near Goshen, Ind., in jumping from his wagon on to a board, some time ago, met with a serious accident.

It was feared at first that this accident was aggravated by rheumatism, which ailment Mr. Updegraff was troubled with some time ago in an unusually severe form. In speaking of it he says:

"About two years ago I was stricken with rheumatism, and for a year was severely troubled with it. It came on me suddenly during the winter, I don't know what caused it unless it was exposure, about the farm.

"It was the old-fashioned rheumatism and began in my lower limbs, gradually working up until my arms, hands and fingers became affected. My body ached all over, especially my limbs, which were swollen, and these by the following spring were almost entirely useless. I had to hire all my work done that spring and summer, but did a little work in harvest time.

"I must have done too much, for soon after that I was confined to my bed for some time. I had the family doctor, but he didn't do me any good. He finally said he could not help me and advised me to try the baths, but I couldn't afford the expense. Inquiries were made at the drug store for something that would be helpful in my case.

"The druggist recommended Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I gave this remedy a fair trial, and soon discovered that it was benefiting me.

"I found that this was a medicine that did what was claimed for it, and when I had taken about a dozen doses of the pills I found that they were helping me. I continued taking them and I am glad today that I did. Why that medicine actually cured me and I didn't take more than six or seven boxes either.

"It was in January, 1897, that I began taking the medicine, and I was completely cured by the first of March. I began early in the spring to do my work, and I kept it up all summer, not missing a day. I have never had any rheumatic trouble with my limbs from that day to this."

"And are you positive that it was Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People that cured you?" asked the reporter.

"Positive, why of course I am. Nothing else did it. I did not take any other medicine at the time, and I was never better unitl I began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I have taken nothing else since, and of course they are what did the work."

At druggists or direct from Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., 50 cents per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

Her Knowledge of Chinese.

A young woman at a watering place one summer made a reputation as a profound linguist in a rather odd manner. She called one day at a Chinese laundry where she had left a shirt waist, but it could not be found, as there was no entry in the book of hieroglyphs corresponding to her pink slip. After a half hour's search the Chinaman found the entry. A mistake had been made, so the entry was crossed out and a new set of hieroglyphs in tiny characters placed below. She was told that the waist would be laundered immediately, and she could get it the next day.

The next day the young woman called for it, accompanied by three other young women. At the seashore the excitement of a visit to the Chinese laundry is not to be despised. The Chinaman to whom the pink slip was presented was not the laundryman of the day before, and he experienced the same difficulty in finding the identifying character, finally saying, "Not in book."

The girl answered calmly, "I can find it," and the Chinaman allowed her to take the book. Turning the leaves until she came to one that had an entry crossed out with another in tiny characters under it, she handed it to the Chinaman. "There it is," and, to his surprise, he found it.

"You only lady I know spik Chinese," he said. And the other girls looked upon her with admiration.—Kansas City World.

A FAMOUS BEAUTY'S RESCUE

Emily Marshall's Walk Over a Human Bridge at Niagara.

Writing of "The Loveliest Woman In All America," William Perrine, in The Ladies' Home Journal, recalls the thrilling adventure of Emily Marshall, the famous Boston beauty, at Niagara Falls. She, with Nathaniel P. Willis and a young, ungainly college student, Job Smith, attempted to go under the falls, in those days a perilous undertaking. After they had proceeded a short distance under the sheet of water there was a rumbling noise and a commotion, and a part of the ledge which formed the path disappeared, cutting Miss Marshall off from her companions by an abyss six feet in width and leaving her but a small stone in the swirling torrents to stand upon.

"In the commotion Job had been forgotten, but instantly a ray of hope shot into Willis' heart when he saw his rugged features, his sandy hair plastered over his forehead, his scanty dress clinging to his form like a skin and his hand trembling on the poet's shoulder as he steadied his steps. Without saying what he intended to do he crept down carefully to the edge of the foaming abyss till he stood up to his knees in the breaking bubbles. It seemed impossible that he could reach the lovely creature or that she could jump forward safely from the slippery rock into his arms.

"Willis covered his eyes in fear and wonder. The next moment when he opened them there lay at his feet the quivering and exhausted girl. Job was nearly seven feet high. He had flung himself over the gulf, caught the rock with his fingers and with certain death if he missed his hold, Miss Marshall had quickly walked over his body in its bridgelike posture. At this moment the guide returned with a rope, fastened it around one of Job's feet and dragged him back through the whirlpool. When he recovered from his immersion, he fell on his knees in a prayer of thanks to God, in which the poet and the beauty devoutly joined him."

Knocks Their Shoes Off.

Strange as it may seem, people killed in a railroad wreck are generally bereft of their shoes by the shock. In commenting on this peculiarity an old railroad engineer said: "A man who is killed in a railroad accident seldom dies with his boots on. I don't know why this should be, but it is a fact. It is particularly true in the case of a man who is struck by an engine and killed. In nine cases out of ten, when the body is picked up, it will be found minus shoes. Even men wearing heavy top boots are not exempt from this strange rule. Why is it? I guess you'll have to ask somebody who is wiser than I am."—Philadelphia Record.

LIEUTENANT PETERSON

Says Peruna Is the Finest Tonic And Invigorator He Ever Used.

Lieutenant Charles Peterson, Hook and Ladder Co. No. 21, writes the following letter to The Peruna Medicine Co., from 827 Belmont avenue, Chicago, Ill.:

"Last year I had a severe attack of la grippe which left me very weak, so that I was unable to perform my duties. Several of my friends advised me to build up on Peruna, and I found it by far the finest tonic and invigorator I had ever used. In two weeks I was strong and well, and if ever I am exposed to unusual hardship incident with my duties at fires, I take a dose or two of Peruna and find that it keeps me in good health."

Charles Peterson.

Lieut. Chas. Peterson.

The above is only one of fifty thousand letters we have on file attesting the merits of Peruna.

There are a great multitude of people in all parts of the land who have entirely lost their health as a result of la grippe; who have recovered from an attack, but find themselves with weakened nerves, deranged digestion, and with but very little of their former powers.

There is no disease known to man that leaves the system in such an outrageous and exasperating condition as la grippe.

For this class of sufferers, Peruna is a specific. Peruna should be taken according to directions and in a few weeks the sufferer will be entirely restored to his accustomed health.

A CHANGE ABOUT THE PLACE.

The place don't seem just like it did before she went away,
It's all so still and lonesome—not a word from her all day;
The old mare whinnies still when I go to the stable door,
But, somehow, things seem different since she ain't here no more.

The vines creep up along the porch just as she trained 'em to;
The flowers grow along the fence, just as they used to do;
The house is left just as it was, but still it seems, to-day,
As if it wasn't just the place from which she went away.

The sun still gets to peepin' in that window over there
Along to'rds breakfast time, and there's her high-backed rockin' chair;
The creek's still flowin' where it flowed—the water's cool and clear—
But still, somehow, it ain't the place it was when she was here.

The hedge still fences in the lane, just as it did when she
Would come, at dinner time, and call across the fields to me—
But where that steeple peeps above the hill she's sleepin' now
And everything's got all turned 'round, it seems to me, somehow.

This doesn't seem like home no more, and often through the day
I get to thinkin' 'tisn't her, but me that's gone away—
That she's at home there on the hill, a-callin' soft and low,
And that I'm goin' back, and glad it's nearly time to go.

—Chicago Times-Herald.

A NEWPORT IDYL

THE ballroom at the Casino was aglow with light and pulsing with music. The ball was at its height a moment before supper.

Standing near a door was a young man whose features were drawn and white, and whose set lips made a picture sadly out of place in that gay throng. His dark eyes followed a slim, graceful girl, with a crown of golden hair and tender, violet eyes, whose dark, long lashes lent them a pathetic look just then.

They seemed to be seeking for some one, but whoever they sought was not found until the dancers had twice made the tour of the room. Then the two pairs of eyes met for a second. Those of the girl had a wistful, questioning look; those of the man an expression of stern relinquishment.

The music ceased just then, and in the little ensuing flutter they lost sight of each other in the crowd.

The man, with a sigh so deep as to be almost a groan, turned away, and, scarcely knowing how he reached there, found himself seated in an easy chair on the wide porch. He gave himself up to bitter reflections.

"I must be crazy to come here to-night. I might in time have learned to forget her, but to see her again, so sweet and so far off. I could not ask her to marry me now on 'little or nothing a year.' She has been brought up to wealth and luxury. It is part and parcel of her daily life, and I would be the most brutal of brutes to ask her to share my poverty. Poor little Nellie! She didn't look any too happy, either. Well, Jim, if you are not a coward you will start now and go—so far away that she will never hear of you again."

Just at this stage of "Jim's" reflections, several persons came along, and in their gay conversation Jim had no part. He half rose to go when he heard his own name mentioned. In spite of the old proverb about listeners, he remained in his chair, which was in deep shadow.

"Poor Jim Alden! Did you see him? He stood by the door looking like the ghost at the feast. What a pity that he went on Wall street! He might have known better. He seemed to be particularly cut up when he saw Miss Burton dancing away and never even looking at him."

"I hear that Miss Burton's engagement to Lloyd Appleby is announced."

"What, that old man! Well, he's rolling in wealth."

"She did not need to marry money."

"The ways of women are past finding out."

The figure in the dark corner glided away swiftly. He had borne all he could. He strode on down toward the Point, scarcely knowing where he was going, until with a sudden sense of a new pain he found that he was standing by the rocks where he had sat only two days before with Nellie.

Then the hot sun blazed down and the heat pulsated from the sand and sea below, and the rocks above, and then, too, there was not the knowledge that he had lost every dollar he had in the world.

The long line of silver light laid across the water suddenly wavered and grew blurred and dim as his eyes filled, and a sob was wrung from the aching heart. He remembered the dimpled fingers that had clasped the parasol, the odor of flowers at her breast, and the clinging against his cheek of a few strands of golden hair tossed there by the wanton wind. He stood there, a black outline against the moonlit water beyond.

Back at the Casino another little drama had been enacted. Nellie had seen more than her trained features had shown, and she knew that unless she acted promptly she would have looked her last upon Jim. Suddenly Jim was more to her than all the world. All the other men and women in the world were effaced from her heart and mind as utterly as if they did not exist. She must find Jim—she must.

Out on the wide portico she flew, with her Aunt Elinor and Mr. Appleby behind her. Jim was not there. With the prescience of love she knew where she should find him, and snatching a white scarf from her aunt's shoulders she said:

"Aunt, you and Mr. Appleby wait for me; I am going to find Jim."

"Nellie! Nellie! You will compromise yourself fatally——"

"I don't care; I love Jim!"

"Nellie!"

But Nellie was gone. Mr. Appleby smiled as, under the cover of the shadow of a column, he said:

"Let her go, Elinor. Nellie is right. Jim is worthy of any good woman."

"But he is poor."

"That he isn't. I brought the news to him that he had just inherited a bigger fortune than he lost. He doesn't know it yet, and, Elinor, we can all be married together. Eh?"

"O—Lloyd!"

"We've waited long enough, dear, I think."

Nellie flew like a white angel down to the Point, her slippered feet scarcely touching the ground. Yes, there was Jim. Was he about to commit suicide, as he stood there so rigidly still? Nellie caught her breath, and then advanced slowly, stilling her throbbing heart by a miracle of will power, a power such as is only given to womankind.

"It's a lovely evening, Mr. Alden, isn't it?" she said, quietly.

"Nellie, little Nellie!" said Jim, in such a transport that it is lucky he couldn't see the sudden color leap to Nellie's cheeks. "I beg pardon, Miss Burton. I forgot for a moment."

"There is nothing to forgive."

"Ah! Where is your aunt—and Mr. Appleby?" asked Jim, stupidly.

"I left them on the porch, settling the date of their wedding day."—Boston Globe.

People Eat Far Too Much.

A Philadelphia physician of note, Dr. Edward H. Dewey, claims to cure all sorts of diseases by starving his patients. The brain, says this practitioner, never loses weight in either sickness or starvation. Usually the mind remains clear when the body has wasted away. The head is the power-house of the body. The stomach is run by brain power. When the stomach does too much work it makes too great a demand upon the brain.

"For more than twenty years," writes this doctor, "I have permitted my sick to do without food so long as there was no desire for it. Not a mouthful was enforced in any case, not one mouthful denied on the first hint of hunger.

"In this I have had all the medical text-books and the entire medical profession as authority unquestioned against me. That food is needed to sustain the strength of the sick has never been a matter of question with the medical profession.

"Many of my sick have gone for more than a month without food. One very sick, in bed for more than a month with acute rheumatism, was able to walk about the room on the forty-sixth day before the first food was taken. Another patient, a woman of 57, went until the forty-third day before she broke her fast, and without any omission of her ordinary duties. A diseased stomach was cured as the result, and now, after five years, there has been no return of the trouble."

Physicians are pretty generally agreed that Americans eat too much—especially too much meat. The no-breakfast habit may not be so very silly after all.

Gen. Stark's Lost Mare.

In an old file of the Hartford Courant, of date Oct. 7, 1777, is an advertisement sent to the paper by General Stark of Bennington fame, which shows that military hero to have had an excellent command of language and much cause for indignation.

Twenty Dollars Reward. Stole from me the subscriber, from Walloomscock, in the time of action, the 16th of August last, a brown Mare, five years old, had a star in her forehead. Also a doeskin seated saddle, blue housing trim'd with white, and a curbed bridle. It is earnestly requested of all committees of safety and others in authority, to exert themselves to recover said thief and mare, so that he may be brought to justice and the mare brought to me; and the person, whoever he be, shall receive the above reward for both, and for the mare alone one half of that sum.

How scandalous, how disgraceful and ignominious must it appear to all friendly and generous souls to have such sly, artful, designing villains enter into the field in the time of action in order to pillage, pilfer and plunder from their brethren when engaged in battle.

JOHN STARK, B. D. G.

Bennington, 11th Sept., 1777.

His Theory.

A novel explanation of the cause of thunder showers was once given a sojourner in a little Nova Scotia town by one of the inhabitants.

"Do you know what makes thunder?" the Nova Scotian inquired of his guest. "I've got a theory of my own, and I call it a pretty good one."

"I should like to hear it," was the diplomatic reply.

"Well," said the host, slowly, "my idea this: You know we hear about the air circulating and circulating all the time. My notion is that the pure air from above comes down here in summer, and gets foul with all the smoke and dirt and grease; and then the heat drives it up again into the clouds, and when it gets up there it's pressed on all round by the clouds coming together, and it explodes! That's my theory, of course," he added, with becoming modesty, "other folks may have others."

ESKIMOS DYING OUT.

WESTERN ALASKA'S NATIVE POPULATION DECREASING.

Unless Means Are Taken Soon to Prevent It, the Native Race Is Likely to Become Extinct—Sickness and Improvidence the Causes.

Among the great questions that are being studied by scientists, in connection with the far northern district of Alaska, is whether or not the advent of civilization into that section is making inroads on the native races. Strange as it may seem, within the last two years the native population of Alaska has been decreasing, and by those who have made a careful study of the matter it is said that within the last twelve months there has been a decrease of fully 60 per cent in the number of those who in former days were considered among the hardiest races and who, in sunshine or frost, were physically strong and knew but very little of fatigue.

As a matter of fact, investigations, it is said, show that the native races of the new realm of gold are fast dying off, and at the same rate of decrease, as in the last two years, it will only be a short time until the Eskimo will be only told of in history or in the fireside tales of those who have been the pioneers in the land of six months' night.

In the work of research the Alaska Geographical Society has made extensive investigations and the above facts are the result of its labors. In July last Arthur C. Jackson, president of the society, went to Alaska in the interests of the society and during the two months of his stay there he paid much attention to the condition of the natives. Among the sights he witnessed in a number of the small Indian settlements along the western coast of the district and far into the interior were many that were heartrending and told a tale of want and suffering that are surely carrying the native Eskimo to his doom. Mr. Jackson returned to Seattle on the Roanoke and in an interview regarding this subject, given at the Rainier-Grand, he said:

"The condition of the native Eskimos in western Alaska is pitiful to behold. During the past year disease has wrought much havoc among them and unless some measures are taken shortly by the government to better their condition it will only be a short time until that race of people will be numbered with the past. During our travels, for my wife was with me, we saw many touching sights, some of which are never to be forgotten.

"To the advance of civilization is partly due their state, for it cannot be said that the Eskimo has yet adapted himself to the new conditions. While I was at Cape Nome I talked with the census supervisor. He informed me that many of his enumerators who did the work in the Koyukuk district brought in with them stories of an appalling nature. He said that in several of the districts, from reports that he had received, he was convinced that fully 60 per cent of the Indians had died from disease and privation since the enumeration began.

"In several of the sections that we visited we found little Indian huts in which there had been no fire for the entire winter season. Wood was scarce, the head of the family was either dead or ill with some one of the many diseases that have been rampant among the Indians of that section during the last season, and there was no one left to go on a journey for wood. So through the long winter day and night these impoverished people lived in squalid poverty with no fire to keep the body warm or with which to prepare a meal, should the victuals be in the house with which to do it.

that we found among the Alaska In-

"But this is but one of the conditions dians that would make the heart sad. Since the advent of the white men into the district in great numbers and the consequent introduction of firearms in abundance the Indian has found it a comparatively easy matter to get all the guns he wanted. It was not long before he understood that powder and ball was a quicker method of gathering skins to sell to his white brother than the bow and arrow. The result of this knowledge was that, whereas in former times he killed, as a rule, only a sufficient number of fur animals to keep him in meat, with arms in his possession he began to ruthlessly slaughter large numbers of fur-bearing animals, the meat of which he could not use and which he allowed to lie on the ground and rot. He saw the white man do this and gave no thought to the consequences or that he was not in the same position as the foreigner whom he attempted to follow.

"The result of this is that to-day there is a scarcity of the fur-bearing animals in western Alaska. The Indian, before he realized it, was robbed of his meat subsistence, and worse than all, probably, is the fact that in this wanton destruction he has lost the animals that furnished him with the furs from which he made his clothing. So it has come to pass that during the last winter, while the house was cold, there was very little meat and the average Eskimo had not sufficient clothing to keep himself warm.

"It is true that within the past two years the Alaska Indian has had a greater revenue from his furs than ever before, but the Indian up there is just as improvident as the Indian in any other part of the United States and so he has nothing left with which to purchase either food or clothing. To these conditions to a large extent is due the great amount of disease and death that has prevailed in that district during the past year, and thus it can be said that directly to the advance of civilization in Alaska is due the present condition of the Eskimo and his threatened extinction."—Seattle Post-Intelligencer.

"DR." DOWIE, OF ZION.

CHICAGO'S FAITH-HEALER AND PREACHER.

In Ten Years He Has Accumulated $5,000,000 and Built Up a Church with 50,000 Members—His Personality.

This is the story of a man who went to Chicago ten years ago with a wife, two children and no money, and who is now worth $5,000,000, is at the head of a church he founded, which has 50,000 members, is the proprietor of several hospitals, the president of a college and of a bank, owns a faith-healing hotel, and the greatest city of religion planned since the Mormons set one on the shores of Salt Lake.

Some time ago he left Chicago in a private car with his retainers for a trip through Europe and the Holy Land. He traveled in state like an Eastern potentate, and weeping subjects followed him to the train and to the steamer. He controls millions of dollars and thousands of minds. He has a larger personal following than any other man in Chicago. He has no machine. He is the machine. The mystery of it all is: "How?"

Hundreds of explanations have been offered. He has been called an impostor and a charlatan, and he has been called a divine messenger. He is of the latter opinion himself. Every man in Chicago knows who this man is. He is John Alexander Dowie, and his institution is Zion. But here the knowledge of a great many persons stops. They have read about Zion in connection with faith-healing and as an experiment in socialism, and have heard of the workings of the church through the troubles into which the disciples have got themselves. They have been mobbed in Hammond, Ind., and Mansfield, Ohio, and in Chicago. Sensational stories have been told about them. Their methods have been harshly criticised. They have been subjected to many forms of persecution.

Their leader has been held up to scorn, has been dragged into the courts in civil and criminal proceedings, and has been characterized as Chicago's worst enemy. His life and the lives of his closest advisers have been searched for evidences of wrong-doing. When these have been found they have been scattered broadcast.

It has lasted ten years, and in that time, in the face of many crusades against him by ministers of the gospel, by the press, the medical profession, State and city officials and a large section of the people, Zion has grown from 200 persons to 50,000; its wealth from $20 to mony millions.

Those who know Zion know, too, that Dowie is Zion. He thought out the plan years ago, and has given his life to the perfection of it. No man in Chicago to-day has a stauncher personal following than he. He is alone responsible for the thing that has made men say that a feudal system as strict as that of the Middle Ages is alive in Chicago now.

This is Dowie: He is 55 years old. His beard and hair are white. He is strongly put together, and always looks as if in perfect health. His step is light, his eyes clear, and his voice is as the voice of a dozen men. He is well educated. He has had the training of a Congregational minister, and has been a minister in that church. He has a style of his own, both in the pulpit and in his literary work. He wastes no words. He is unconventional in his choice of words, and just as unconventional in his delivery. He calls names from his pulpit—sometimes ugly names—and he rides roughshod over the feelings of his congregations. He abuses them when he thinks they need it, and he wheedles when he believes that is the best course. His people love him better than they love their homes and their families, and many of them have left both to follow him.

He has magnetism. He calls himself "the fighter of the devil." He also fights secret societies, the use of tobacco and alcohol, the medical profession, the press and the habit of eating pork. He fights them all in his own way.

He went to a theological seminary in Edinburgh, and then to Sydney, New South Wales. It was in the seminary where he was studying the principles of Congregationalism that he first found the faith-healing theory. While reading his Bible he made up his mind that Christ menat to cure the body as well as the soul, and that prayer, accompanied by the laying on of hands, would do what was required. He kept his belief to himself. He had stomach trouble and was going to die. The doctors could do nothing for him. He read the Bible all one night, prayed for a cure and was cured. That is, he says so.

GREAT DAM ON THE NILE.

Masonry Will Reach High Water Level by Next Month.

Thousands of men will be at work unremittingly from November until next July on the great dam at Assouan, on the Nile, and by that time the great wall of masonry, a mile and a quarter from shore to shore, will be up to the high-water level of the river. At this point of the Nile the river runs between an archipelago of rocky islets, submerging many of them at high tide and always rushing fiercely through the channels between them. The masonry is built from island to island, and when it is finished will present a broad carriage road reaching from bank to bank and more than 300 feet above the lowest water level below it. At present nearly all the foundations have been laid. There are a number of channels, of which the one on the left bank is called the Great West channel, and the next in importance are the three channels nearer the middle, called the Bab-el-Sogair, the Bab-el-Haron and the Bab-el-Kebir. The foundations for the western channel are the only foundations not yet laid; those of the three Babs have been for some time finished, and during their last season their sluices were completed.

The type of dam selected is that of "an unsubmergible masonry dam," pierced with numerous under-sluices, through which will pass the silt-laden waters of the floods, while the clear supply at the close of the inundation may be impounded with no risk of inconvenient silting-up of the reservoir. These sluices, about six feet each in width, number 180, divided into eighteen groups of ten each. The piers between the sluices are some nine feet wide, but in order to enable failures, should they occur, to be localized the groups of ten are separated by massive abutment piers.

The traffic of the river is to be provided for by a chain of locks, in number six or seven. This is at the western extremity of the dam, and is called the navigation channel. It runs at right angles to the dam.

ing means of illumination—to wit, coal gas. Fixed to one of the walls is an iron plate bearing the following inscription: "William Murdoch lived in this house 1782 to 1798. Made his first locomotive here and tested it in 1784. Invented gas-lighting and used it in this house 1792."

A Hen's Hearing.

The Rural New-Yorker says that hens have a wonderfully keen ear, and gives this story in proof of it:

At a certain town in Indiana, dining-cars are run on to a side track and swept out. The hens ranging in the vicinity gather around these cars for their dinner with clock-like regularity.

These Wabash hens, so acute is their sense of hearing, can distinguish the whistles of the dining-car trains from those of the local passenger and freight trains, or even from that of a locomotive running wild, and they sit placidly on their nests or scratch gravel in a nonchalant way upon the approach of all locomotives save those pulling the dining-cars.

And this is not all. These hens can distinguish the whistles of the locomotives on the dining-car trains at almost incredible distances; so that if one of these trains is late twenty minutes, for instance, intending passengers do not look at the blackboard bulletin, but merely note the distance of the hens picking their way toward the crossing.

It is asserted, moreover, that neighbors of a mathematical turn of mind have an easy system of setting their clocks and watches to railroad time by the movements of these sharp-hearing hens.

WOULD GRACE OUR TABLES.

Some Vegetables from New Zealand that Should Be Acclimated.

According to United States Consul Dillingham at Auckland there are several vegetable novelties in New Zealand which might be introduced into other countries with benefit to the people, especially where drouths are not infrequent.

"A certain cabbage, called 'Yates' aphis-proof cabbage,' an Australian-raised variety," he says, "gave, notwithstanding the intense drouth of last summer, good hearts and remained almost entirely free from aphis, while every other variety of cabbage was riddled by the pest. A better opportunity could not have occurred for testing its hardiness. After the heart is cut it throws out a number of small hearts and loose leaves, all of which are tender and of a good flavor, and, as they rapidly reproduce themselves after cutting, a bed of these cabbages will keep a house in vegetables all through the summer and autumn. A cabbage that would really resist aphis and stand the hot, dry summers has long been a desideratum in Australian gardens, and it is thought that this variety will meet the want.

"Another vegetable worthy of attention is an 'African cucumber,' a plant of the cucumber family from Rhodesia, South Africa. The fruit is six inches long, of a bright orange color and covered with spines. Even for ornamental purposes the plant is well worth growing, but it may be also used as a fruit, the flesh being soft and juicy and in appearance much like passion fruit. Eaten with sugar, the flavor is very similar to that of a rock melon.

"Another novelty is called the 'mongri,' or edible podded radish. It is a new vegetable from Java and is as easily grown as the ordinary radish, which are crisp and tender, with a delicious flavor. Persons who cannot eat the common radish because of its indigestible qualities should hail this new variety with pleasure. It makes an excellent salad; it is also delicious when boiled, having a delicate asparagus flavor."

Slow and Safe.

A learned professor shows that the custom of the French peasantry in lighting bonfires to ward off the danger from lightning, while perhaps born of superstition, really has some basis in reason. In one thousand cases of damage by lightning the number of factory chimneys was less than one per cent, showing that the smoke acts as a good conductor for carrying away the electricity slowly and safely.

Poverty is more of a punishment than it is a crime.

HOME MIXED FERTILIZER.

Items From the Ohio Station About Fertilizing Materials and Their Cost.

For several years the Ohio station has been using a mixture of equal parts of tankage and acid phosphate, with a small addition of muriate of potash (200 pounds to the ton), with most satisfactory results, but in order to make a more direct comparison of this mixture with factory mixtures the station began a year ago a comparative experiment in which four brands of factory mixed fertilizers, bought direct from four of the oldest fertilizer manufacturing firms in the state, are being used side by side with four home mixtures, made from the materials named, in such a way as to give approximately equal percentages of ammonia, total and available phosphoric acid and potash in the home mixtures to those claimed in the factory mixed brands.

The general outcome of this test to date is that home mixtures of similar chemical composition, made from the materials named, have given an equal increase of crop when used on corn with standard brands of factory mixed fertilizers, and at a reduction of more than 40 per cent in cost.

Acid phosphate is the basis of the phosphoric acid in practically all factory mixed fertilizers. It is a fossil bone, found in South Carolina, Florida and Tennessee, which is ground to a fine powder and mixed with sulphuric acid in order to make its phosphoric acid more easily soluble. The northern markets are supplied chiefly from Baltimore, where it may be bought at prices ranging from $10 per ton for single sack lots down to $7.50 per ton in carloads in bulk for a grade analyzing 14 per cent soluble phosphoric acid. In the experiments made at the Ohio experiment station a pound of available phosphoric acid in acid phosphate has apparently been as effective as a pound of phosphoric acid in bone.

Tankage is made at all the great slaughter houses. It contains both phosphoric acid and ammonia and is variable in quality. Different grades are classed as 6 and 35, 7 and 30, 8 and 20, 9 and 20, etc., meaning that they contain 6 per cent ammonia and 35 per cent bone phosphate or 7 per cent ammonia and 30 per cent bone phosphate, etc., the term bone phosphate meaning that combination of phosphoric acid and lime which is found in bone and of which about 46 per cent is phosphoric acid. The lower grades shade off below into raw bone, which might be called a 5 and 50 tankage, and above into dried blood, which contains 10 to 14 per cent ammonia with 2 or 3 per cent or only a trace of phosphoric acid.

A 7 and 30 tankage has been sold in Cleveland for several years at the uniform price of $17 per ton in single sacks or carloads. The latest quotations in Chicago range from $12.50 per ton for 6 and 35 tankage up to $15.50 for 9 and 20 tankage, this being the standard grade.

Muriate of potash is a product of the Stassfurt mines in Germany, and its sale is controlled by a German syndicate. It may be bought in New York or Cleveland at about 2 to 2¼ cents per pound. Both acid phosphate and tankage are fine, dry meals, in perfect condition to be used in the fertilizer drill, and mixing them does not alter their condition. Muriate of potash resembles common salt in appearance, except that it is usually somewhat yellowish in color. In its commercial condition it is about half actual potash.

A Business Method.

The cut, from The Farm Journal, tells it own story. The owner of this device is going to know hereafter just what each cow is doing. He will weigh each cow's milk as it is drawn, and then put it down on the paper in black and white—the milk record for each week. The prosperous farmer makes use of business methods. He knows what each animal is doing, and whether she gains or loses on particular kinds of feed. Guesswork is poor business on the farm, as elsewhere.

WEIGHING THE MILK.

And in this connection it may be mentioned that the pleasing, cleanly and economical practice of delivering milk in glass bottles is steadily increasing.

Joke on the Major.

The major, just returned from Boston, tells in strict confidence this story:

"I had engaged my berth and was standing on the rear platform five minutes before the train pulled out of the Park square depot, when a middle aged woman and a handsome girl, both ladies, passed me and entered the car, accompanied by a gentlemanly looking chap who carried their baggage. A moment later this fellow rushed up to me and said he was in a most embarrassing position, had his sister and mother aboard and had lost his mileage book. He would introduce me to them and give me any security for $25. I said I needed neither introduction nor security, but would give him $10—all I had to spare. He insisted on giving me his diamond scarfpin, and then rushed into the station to see if he could get more cash. As the train pulled out without him he came running wildly after it, but had to give it up.

"Then the porter approached me tentatively. 'Was that man annoying you?' he said. I told him no. 'He insisted on carrying the baggage of two ladies inside, sah, an—an—did he get any money out of you?'

"'Of course he didn't,' said I, but I took the first opportunity of examining that pin. It was worth about five cents."—Buffalo News.

A Jackassical Decision.

Pin-head Trout in a decision as to marriages in the State of Nevada once more by his bray betrays the quality of wisdom with which he is endowed. That the State of California can legislate for the State of Nevada is a proposition so absurd, so nonsensical, that only the suggestion of boodle could explain any decision leading that way. By what method are the officers of the State of Nevada to ascertain whether candidates for matrimony are eligible or not. If the law of the State of California in reference to divorces is to stand, some method should be devised by which divorcees can be identified when they come before the officers of neighboring States, so that these officers who owe their fealty to the State appointing or electing them can understand that they are disobeying the laws of the State of California, while obeying the laws of their own State. We suggest that these divorcees, both male and female, be branded on some suitable and secluded place, properly denoted and described by statute, giving the date of the divorce and such other particulars as will protect the officers of the State of Nevada and all others interested from doing illegal acts, and that the statute shall compel the divorcees to prove by exhibition of the brand that they are eligible to matrimony. Of course it might be a little difficult to enforce this California law in the State of Nevada, but something must be done to prevent pin head judges from rendering stupid decisions.—City Argus.

Tonapah.

W. J. Douglass, who recently visited Tonapah, is enthusiastic over the outlook. He is interested with Bob Stewart in a lease there and is confident they will do well. He says that there are large quantities of ore that will pay big if milled on the ground, but nothing is being shipped except high grade ore. Mr. Douglass predicts that there will be 200 men there within two months. Even if the ore goes no deeper than the lowest present workings—15 feet—it is a valuable proposition, but the strength of the ledges, the character of the ore and the formation indicate that the ledges will do down hundreds of feet. Mr. Douglass is preparing to build an assay office and house at Tonapah. Douglass & Stewart will ship a car-load this week to Selby.—Hawthorne Bulletin.

From private sources it is learned that there is considerable sickness in Bakersfield, and for some time past the death rate has been large. Wm. Johnson, a former resident of Independence is reported dangerously ill with pneumonia. There are also several cases of smallpox, but Dr. H. H. Look, the State Board of Health's expert, says there is no need for a feeling of uneasiness, and no necessity for quarantining the town as the cases are true smallpox of a mild nature and are sufficiently isolated and the quarantine of the houses where it is located will be sufficient to keep the disease from spreading.

Never does death's unrelenting call come so ruthlessly and with such heart-breaking sadness as when his victim is in the flower of youth, full of life's eager purposes, and endowed with the vigor and inclination to lead the life of activity and usefulness. While we know that "into each life some rain must fall, some days be cold and dark and dreary," it is difficult to become reconciled to the divine purpose which calls from earth the living being whose life was full of noble pursuits.

Augusta Kispert died Jan. 1, 1901, at the California Hospital, Los Angeles, at which place she had been taken for medcal treated. She had been ill for several weeks before going to Los Angeles. She was afflicted with consumption, not only of the lungs, but of every tissue of the body. Her sufferings were intense, but she had every care that could bestowed upon her. When the family were told there was no help in this world for her, Ida, her sister, who never left her side day or night, went to nurse her. She did all that a loving sister could do, and though her own health was in danger she could not be induced to leave Gusta.

The funeral occurred on Tuesday, Jan. 8, at 2 o'clock p. m., from the residence of Mr. John Shepherd, George's Creek. A large crowd followed her to her last resting place in the Odd Fellows Cemetery, Independence. A very impressive part of the ceremony was the filing of schoolmates who, as they marched past the bier, cast bouquets in the grave. Rev. G. Bigelow, pastor of the Methodist church, preached the funeral sermon.

Gusta was one of a family of seven children, and her death is the second to occur in the family. She was born in Inyo county and would soon have reached her sixteenth year. She received her education at George's Creek, from which school she graduated with honor last June. Being a favorite at school as well as in the whole community, many, many tears of regret were shed as she was laid to rest.

The profusion of flowers which the friends of the family and of the deceased provided, is eloquent testimony of the esteem in which she was held. The grave was also decorated with beautiful flowers and Gusta was laid to rest among them.

"And beneath the moaning trees,
Full of rest, thy body lieth,
While far up is clear sunshine,
Underneath a sky divine,
Her loosed wings her spirit trieth
Oft she strove to spread them here,
But they were too white and clear
For our dingy atmosphere."

"The calm spot where thy body lieth,
Gladdens thy soul in Paradise,
It is so still and holy;
Thy body sleeps serenely there,
And well for it thy soul may care,
It was so beautiful and fair
Lily white so wholly,
Sleep, sweet Gusta, sleep."

SUPERIOR COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Hon. Walter A. Lamar, Judge.

PROBATE.

THURSDAY, Jan. 10, 1901.

In the matter of the estate of Maria Thede, deceased—Final account of Administrator allowed and approved and the petition for distribution granted.

MILITARY SPAIN.

Spain has a permanent army, an active reserve and a sedentary reserve.

Spain's frontier is completely protected by a cordon of forts and fortified towns.

Spain's standing army always numbers about 70,000. Recently it has numbered about 100,000, mostly boys.

A Spaniard drafted for war at home can secure exemption on payment of $300; if drafted for colonial service, the cost is $400.

During the Napoleonic wars Bonaparte gave orders to the French fleet that two Spanish vessels should always be counted as equal to one French ship.

In the year before Spain's war with Cuba began the government took in about $1,800,000 from drafted men who purchased exemption. In the first year of the war the figure rose to $5,400,000.

FICKLE FRANCE.

It is a curious fact that when France was a monarchy it was the friend of the United States and has become its enemy only since it adopted a republican form of government.—Kansas City Star.

The spectacle of the French republic aiding a decaying monarchy in enslaving its subjects is quite as interesting as her alliance with the most powerful despotism of Europe.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

A Side Hill Poultry House.

If the land slopes to the east, dig into the bank so as to make a level floor. Dig a trench and fill with loose stones for a foundation. On this build a cement wall of rough stones as shown.

A WARM POULTRY HOUSE.

Then cement the floor. This will give an exceedingly warm pen. The cut shows a section of the earth, the straight dotted line indicating the position of the cemented floor and the other dotted lines the stone foundation and the cemented stonework. The open scratching shed is coming to be greatly prized by poultry men, says The Farm Journal, in giving this plan.

Australasian Beef.

The Queenslander contends that, federation or no federation, Queensland is destined to be the great beef raising section of the Australasian group. In 1897 she possessed 6,089,000 cattle, or about half the number in the whole of Australasia. It is true that, in consequence of drought and the tick pest, the cattle number half a million less than they did two years ago, but corresponding losses have occurred in other colonies. But that federation would immensely stimulate cattle breeding in Queensland there is no doubt, as it would sweep away duties on cattle varying in the different colonies from 20 shillings to 40 shillings a herd.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FORFEITURE NOTICE.

TO FRED ZOLLER:

Common Sense Talk with Women

If a person is ill and needs a medicine is it not wise to get one that has stood the test of time and has hundreds of thousands of cures to its credit?

A great many women who are ill try everything they hear of in the way of medicine, and this experimenting with unknown drugs is a constant menace to their already impaired health.

This seems to us very unwise, for there are remedies which are no experiments and have been known years and years to be doing only good.

Take for instance Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound; for thirty years its record has been one unbroken chain of success. No medicine for female ills the world has ever known has such a record for cures.

It seems so strange that some people will take medicines about which they really know nothing, some of which might be, and are, really harmful; while on the other hand it is easily proved that over one million women have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

We have published in the newspapers of the United States more genuine testimonial letters than have ever been published in the interest of any other medicine.

All this should, and does, produce a spirit of confidence in the hearts of women which is difficult to dislodge, and when they are asked to take something else they say, "No, we want Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, which has been tried, and never found wanting, whose reliability is established far beyond the experimental stage."

We have thousands of letters like the following addressed to Mrs. Pinkham, showing that Monthly Suffering is Always Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, also Backache and Bearing-down pains.

"I suffered untold agony every month and could get no relief until I tried your medicine; your letter of advice and a few bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound have made me the happiest woman alive. I shall bless you as long as I live."—MISS JOIE SAUL, Dover, Mich.

"Four years ago I had almost given up hope of ever being well again. I was afflicted with those dreadful headache spells which would sometimes last three or four days. Also had backache, bearing-down pains, leucorrhœa, dizziness, and terrible pains at monthly periods, confining me to my bed. After reading so many testimonials for your medicine, I concluded to try it. I began to pick up after taking the first bottle, and have continued to gain rapidly, and now feel like a different woman. I can recommend Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in the highest terms to all sick women."—MISS ROSA HELDEN, 126 W. Cleveland Ave., Canton, O.

Two Letters which Prove that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Will Remove Tumor and Cure Other Female Weakness.

"Two years ago I was a great sufferer from womb trouble and profuse flowing each month, and tumors would form in the womb. I had four tumors in two years. I went through treatment with doctors, but they did me no good, and I thought I would have to resort to morphine.

"The doctor said that all that could help me was to have an operation and have the womb removed, but I had heard of Mrs. Pinkham's medicine and decided to try it, and wrote for her advice, and after taking her Vegetable Compound the tumors were expelled and I began to get stronger right along, and am as well as ever before. Can truly say that I would never had gotten well had it not been for Lydia E. Pinkham's Compound."—MARY A. STAHL, Watsontown, Pa.

"After following the directions given in your kind letter for the treatment of leucorrhea, I can say that I have been entirely cured by the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's remedies, and will gladly recommend them to my friends."—A. B. DAVIDS, Binghamton, N. Y.

Another Case of Womb, Kidney and Bladder Trouble Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR FRIEND—Two years ago I had child-bed fever and womb trouble in its worst form. For eight months after birth of babe I was not able to sit up. Doctors treated me, but with no help. I had bearing-down pains, burning in stomach, kidney and bladder trouble and my back was stiff and sore, the right ovary was badly affected and everything I ate distressed me, and there was a bad discharge.

"I was confined to my bed when I wrote to you for advice and followed your directions faithfully, taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, Liver Pills and using the Wash, and am now able to do the most of my housework. I believe I should have died if it had not been for your Compound. I hope this letter may be the result of benefiting some other suffering woman. I recommend your Compound to every one."—MRS. MARY VAUGHN, Trimble, Pulaski Co., Ky.

Art's Happy Discovery.

"Dauber has hit it at last. He's making fame and money."

"How?"

"People have begun to notice that he paints smaller hands and feet than any other portrait artist in town."—Chicago Record.

TO SEEK THE NORTH POLE.

Evelyn B. Baldwin, the Latest Aspirant to Arctic Honors.

Next year will see the beginning of an international race in search of the north pole. In Europe Dr. Nansen, the famous Norwegian explorer, and the adventurous Italian Prince Louis, of Savoy, more familiarly known as the Duke of Abruzzi, who recently returned from the Arctic after having reached the furthest point north yet reached by man, have united to form a joint expedition. In the United States Evelyn B. Baldwin, an explorer, who has gained considerable reputation, and William H. Ziegler, a New York millionaire, are fitting up an expedition, which in point of equipment and number of men and resources surpasses all of its predecessors and which it is claimed will reach the pole if it is within the range of human possibility. All of the expenses of this American expedition are to be borne by Mr. Ziegler and it matters not how great they may be. It has been the hope of Mr. Ziegler, ever since he was a young man of 17, to solve the secret of the frozen north and now he claims he has found the person capable of doing it. Mr. Ziegler is himself too old to accompany the expedition further than Greenland.

Mr. Baldwin, who will conduct the perilous quest, is a rugged, hardy and courageous traveler, inured to the privations and alive to the dangers which attend all attempts at reaching the pole. Mr. Baldwin accompanied Lieut. Peary in his efforts to gain the pole in 1893 and in 1894, and was a conspicuous member of the expedition which was commanded by Wellman two years ago.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

He Has Been Returned to Power by the Liberals' Victory in Canada.

Sir Wilfred Laurier, who has been returned to power by the victory of the liberals in Canada, has been the leader of his party since 1887. Four years ago he led the liberals to triumph at the polls, and was sworn into office as President of the Privy Council on July 9, 1896. His record since that time has been evidently pleasing to the people. He settled the vexed school question in Manitoba so as to take it out of politics altogether, and his administration in other respects has been satisfactory to the electorate. On his visit to England in 1897 he received almost regal honor. In the same year he was the recipient of unusual honors from the Pope and the President of France. Sir Wilfrid on his return was met with acclaim in numerous cities of Canada, which vied with one another in the warmth and enthusiasm of their receptions. In 1898 he acted as one of the joint commissioners for the settlement of matters in dispute between Canada and the United States.

SIR WILFRID LAURIER.

On His Dignity.

I get queer answers sometimes, said an old advertiser, when I ask my customers, as I frequently do, what publication they saw my advertisement in.

As a rule they reply courteously, but once in a while a man takes the question as an affront. One pompous old fellow told me it was none of my business. Another advised me to "hire a checking clerk." A languid young man referred me to his valet. But I was worst taken aback by a roughly dressed customer once to whom I put the usual question:

"What magazine, may I ask, did you see my 'ad' in?"

"In all of them, sir," he replied, indignantly. "Did you think, sir, from my appearance, that I read only one?"

Original Greening Apple Tree.

The American Cultivator says that the original Greening apple tree is still standing on the farm of Solomon Drowne at Mount Hygeia, in North Foster, R. I. The tree was a very old one when the farm was sold in 1801. The seller informed the purchaser that it was a pity the old tree was going into decay as it produced the best fruit of any tree in the orchard. The purchaser determined to see how long he could keep it alive, and it still survives after almost another century has been added to its venerable years. But it shows signs of final decay, and the parent of all the famous Rhode Island greenings, which has set its grafts on the orchards of almost all the world, will be but a neighborhood memory.

Fair Visitor—So you have really decided not to sell your house?

Fair Hostess—Yes. You see we placed the matter in the hands of a real estate agent. After reading his lovely advertisement neither John nor myself could think of parting with such a wonderful and perfect home.—London Tit-Bits.

Mrs. Good—It is drink that has brought you so low.

The Tramp—Yes'm. It has brought me so low that I can't get a drink.—Puck.

A Story About Wilberforce.

Before he became a bishop he had been archdeacon of Surrey, and his old archdeaconry became a part of his latter bishopric of Winchester. At a meeting of the clergy at Clapham his chaplain told him that an old Dr. ——, who had been many years in the diocese, was vexed at having been forgotten.

"Yes," said the bishop: "I have not the smallest recollection of him, but I will make it all right and will go out and speak to him. Which is he?" He was pointed out, and the bishop made his way to him:

"My dear Dr. ——, I have not had a moment to ourselves for a real conversation with you. I need not ask how you are after all these years. Do you still ride your gray mare?"

"Yes, my lord. How good of you to remember her," etc.

The chaplain, who was within earshot, said when he again came near the bishop:

"Then you did remember Dr. —— after all?"

"Not a bit of it," said the bishop. "I saw the gray hairs on his coat, and I chanced the animal's sex."—"Kegan Paul's Memoirs."

A Telephone Enigma.

"I recently heard," said the inquisitive man who had the faculty of being able to be in two places at once, "the following conversation over the telephone:

"'Who are you, please?'

"'Watt.'

"'What's your name, please?'

"'Watt's my name.'

"'Yes, what's your name?'

"'I say my name is Watt. You're Jones?'

"'No. I'm Knott.'

"'Will you tell me your name?'

"'Will Knott.'

"'Why won't you?'

"'I say my name is William Knott.'

"'Oh, I beg your pardon.'

"'Then you'll be in this afternoon if I come around, Watt?'

"'Certainly, Knott.'

"Do you wonder they rang off in despair and disgust?"—Kansas City Independent.

LITERARY NOTES.

Judging by the handsome Prospectus just issued, it may be said that the editors have been to "the ends of the earth" in search of fresh material for The Youth's Companion, and while celebrated statesmen, scientists, diplomats and story-writers have been found nearer home for other topics, the use of the familiar phrase is especially justified by the notable variety of sketches of travel and adventures which have been procured. The Arctic explorer, F. G. Jackson, the Asiatic explorer, Dr. Sven Hedin, and the African explorer, Sir Henry M. Stanley, are prominent in one group of notable contributors.

"What is the difference between a person suffering from heat prostration and Allen's Foot-Ease? One feels the heat and the other heals the feet."—Life.

Humors

They take possession of the body, and are Lords of Misrule.

They are attended by pimples, boils, the itching tetter, salt rheum, and other cutaneous eruptions, by feelings of weakness, languor, general debility and what not.

They cause more suffering than anything else.

Health, Strength, Peace and Pleasure require their expulsion, and this is positively effected, according to thousands of grateful testimonials, by which radically and permanently drives them out and builds up the whole system.

ANOTHER AID TO MATRIMONY.

The Ring-Bearer a Feature of Up-to-Date Weddings.

At many of the up-to-date weddings the ring-bearer is an important feature of the bridal procession as it slowly marches up the aisle. Usually this functionary is a small boy—not so small, however, that he will lose the precious circlet with which he is entrusted—dressed as a page and carrying with much importance the satin pillow that holds the ring.

This is not an absolutely new feature of weddings, but it is one that should be encouraged by fond parents who would have the ceremony go off without a hitch. As things are now, the wedding ring is a fruitful source of trouble. When the groom take charge of it himself he invariably forgets in which pocket he put it, and it is only produced after a nerve-racking pause and much fumbling.

When it is intrusted to the care of the best man, it is as like as not to be dropped by his nervous fingers as he awkwardly essays to hand it to his friend. Therefore, the little ring-bearer in doublet and hose is not only a picturesque addition to the wedding procession as he walks along beside the flower girl—he is also important for the preservation of peace and tranquillity.

It is prophesied, by the by, that the fashionable wedding with its bridesmaids, its maid of honor, its flower girl, its music and flowers and chatting, criticising host of spectators will soon be a thing of the past.

A goodly number of young folks in smart circles have recently slipped quietly away after their engagements have beene announced and been married at a clergyman's house simply to avoid this ostentatious display.

Men have always been restive under a custom which is to them theatrical and trying in the extreme, but they have yielded as the American man usually does to the wishes of the women.

Now, however, even femininity seems to begin to look upon the fashionable wedding as a great bore and as unnecessary expense, and in consequence slips away quietly with the man of its choice, foregoing the pleasure of court trains and tulle veils, and is married with the gardener and cook of the rector as the sole witnesses.—Baltimore News.

The Officer Was Satisfied.

Sir William Turner, a Scotch savant of note, is an authority on electric fish, having given much study to their peculiarities. At a "smoker" recently given by the British association he told, with much gusto, how he once got the best of an unduly inquisitive customs officer. "When first I went to Edinburgh," he said, "the professor to whom I was assistant possessed a very rare specimen of an electric fish. Though, in a general way, like any other fish to all appearance, anyone who touched this specimen received an electric shock of such severity as to put an end to any further desire for close acquaintance with it. A professor on the continent who was greatly interested in electric fishes expressed a strong desire to see this Edinburgh specimen, and at the beginning of the autumn vacation I was intrusted with the duty of conveying it, in a specially constructed box, across the channel for his inspection. On arriving on the other side I assured the customs officer that I had nothing to declare, but, unfortunately for him, the appearance of this box excited his suspicion. I repeated my assurances of bona fides and informed him that the box contained a fish. As he still appeared unsatisfied," continued Sir William, speaking in characteristically measured tones, "I advised him, in—the—most—courteous manner, that an investigation of the contents of the box was inadvisable. He, however, was a somewhat determined man and observed that he had better see about it for himself. Accordingly he opened the lid of the box, inserted his hand, and—— Well, I had no more trouble with the custom house."

Miss' Costume.

The Shoe.

Hereupon I ventured to reason with woman.

"Your conventional immunities," I urged, "are not compatable with the new possibilities which you seek to assume! There is where the shoe pinches!"

The woman gave me a withering look.

"Pinches!" she exclaimed most scornfully. "It's a mile too big! I could wear two sizes smaller!"

Oh, what a futile thing mere logic seemed now!—Detroit Journal.

On Wheels.

Not only is the bicycle in Cathay a fact, but the Coreans have taken to wheeling. Consul General Allen reports that two ex-cabinet ministers may be seen on the streets of Seoul on wheels, getting more pleasure out of their machines than they ever got out of their offices. The consul general there thinks there is a good field in Corea for American bicycles, which already constitute a majority of those owned in that country.

Women are Handicapped.

Too Frequent Illness Debars Them From a Successful Career in the Business World—How It May Be Overcome.

From the Free Press, Detroit, Mich.

The greatest drawback today with women that work in the stores and factories is, that they do not take the right care of their health. Business men frequently say they can't depend on women because they are ill too often. If every young woman would take the right care of herself this complaint would never be heard. Mrs. C. W. Mansfield, of 58 Farrar Street, Detroit, Mich., is a business woman, and a successful one, too. Employing many young women and having years of experience in the business world, she is in position to speak of women who earn a livelihood.

"For years," she says, "I suffered in silence and was so worn out at night that I could not sleep. I visited a female specialist who said I had a complication of ailments peculiar to women. I could not find relief from her remedies and had tried so many kinds of medicine that I had given up all hope of ever getting better.

"I was given a box of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, by a young lady in my employ. The first box gave me much relief and I was able to rest at night for the first time in many months.

"I then bought more pills and think I must have used a dozen boxes in my own case, but have given away to suffering women double that amount. Without a doubt these pills are a good medicine, for they cured me, and have cured several people to my knowledge.

"I think that if you should ask any of the druggists of Detroit, who are the best buyers of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, they would say the young women.

"These pills certainly build up the nervous system and many a young woman owes her life to them.

"As a business woman I am pleased to recommend them, as they did more for me than any physician, and I can give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People credit for my general good health today."

No discovery of modern times has proved such a boon to women as Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Acting directly on the blood and nerves, invigorating the body, regulating the functions, they restore the strength and health to the exhausted woman where every effort of the physician proves unavailing.

For the growing girl they are of the utmost benefit, for the mother indispensable, for every woman invaluable.

At druggists or direct from Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Scehenectady, N. Y., 50 cents per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

THE BELLA VISTA RANCH.

A Famous Property That Will at Once Become the Scene of Extensive Oil Operations.

The late Creed Haymond, famous as a lawyer and politician and man of wealth, created on the Bella Vista ranch in San Mateo County, a country seat, where he sought rest from business.

After Mr. Haymond's death the property was purchased by Henry H. Davis, the well-known attorney, of 420 California street, San Francisco. The profuse oil seepages on the ranch were known to Mr. Haymond, and he often spoke of development, but nothing was done in that line until Mr. Davis acquired the property. Recent investigations by oil experts determined Mr. Davis to organize the Bella Vista oil syndicate, comprising well-known San Francisco and Kansas City business men and capitalists. The president of the company is Dr. A. E. Neumeister of Kansas City; first vice-president is Henry H. Davis of San Francisco, Charles F. O'Brien of Kansas City is secretary. The assistant secretary and manager is Thomas Gilbert of San Francisco, a practical oil man of many years' experience.

The Bella Vista oil syndicate opened a beautiful office recently on the first floor of the Bush-street side of the Mills building, where stock is on sale, and where prospectuses and full information may be had.

The capital stock is $1,500,000, the shares $1 each, par value, non-assessable. A limited amount of stock is offered to investors at 10 cents per share. Offices have also been opened at Kansas City.

It is proposed to begin at once to develop the Bella Vista ranch, the entire 1200 acres of which is believed to be first-class oil territory. The property is eighteen miles west from Redwood City, is abundantly supplied with wood and water, and will at once become the seat of active oil development.

Forewarned, Forearmed.

The liability to disease is greatly lessened when the blood is in good condition, and the circulation healthy and vigorous. For then all refuse matter is promptly carried out of the system; otherwise it would rapidly accumulate—fermentation would take place, the blood become polluted and the constitution so weakened that a simple malady might result seriously.

A healthy, active circulation means good digestion and strong, healthy nerves.

As a blood purifier and tonic S. S. S. has no equal. It is the safest and best remedy for old people and children because it contains no minerals, but is made exclusively of roots and herbs.

No other remedy so thoroughly and effectually cleanges the blood of impurities. At the same time it builds up the weak and debilitated, and renovates the entire system. It cures permanently all manner of blood and skin troubles.

S. S. S. cured me, and my skin is as clear and smooth as any one's."

KILL THE GERMS!

Spread of Germs Through the Human System Instantly Checked by "5 DROPS."

"5 DROPS" is a germ killer; a preventive of disease; a builder of nerve force; a maker of pure blood; of healthy tissue. Where it is used there can be no disease. It is a natural foe to germ life. Left to themselves, without adequate measures of prevention, the germs which enter the weak human system multiply so rapidly that their numbers become beyond human comprehension, destroying the structures of the body until death comes to the victim's relief. "5 DROPS," if taken in time, is an absolute preventive of disease. IT is the only absolute cure for Rheumatism, driving out of the system forever the uric acid and other impurities which cause it in its various forms. It is taken up at once by the blood. Hence its work is quicker, surer and many times more effective. You should never be without it. Secure a bottle today. You will then be on the safe side. "5 Drops" is harmless and can be used by a child as well as by an adult. It is used with unfailing effect in the following diseases: Rheumatism, Sciatica, Backache, Neuralgia, Gout, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Hay Fever, Catarrh, Croup, La Grippe, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Sleeplessness, Nervousness, Nervous and Neuralgic Headaches, Earache, Toothache, Heart Weakness, Paralysis, Creeping Numbness, Etc.

I WAS AT DEATH'S DOOR.

Gentlemen: I want to tell you what your "5 Drops" has done for me. I was for two years a sufferer of untold misery. My feet were swollen so I could not wear shoes and my hands were drawn so I could not open them, nor could I shut them. They cramped half shut. My husband had me try every medicine he could hear of and I still suffered untold agonies. Nothing I could get would ease my pain, until last November one of my neighbors had Rheumatism so bad he could not walk. He told my husband about "5 Drops" curing him, so he got me a dollar bottle, and in three weeks I walked without a cane and could use my hands, something I had not done for two years. I give all the praise to "5 Drops." My neighbor's know that I was at death's door. Now I have used four bottles of "5 Drops" and can do my work with ease. I am still taking it sometimes. If this will do any good to ward getting suffering people to use "5 Drops," use this as you please. If any one doubts this, send them to my friends and neighbors. ELIZABETH C. JUST COMMON FOLKS,

If only sweetest bells were rung
How we should miss the minor chimes
If only grandest poets sung,
There'd be no simple little rhymes;
The modest clinging vine adds grace
To all the forest's giant oaks,
And 'mid earth's mighty is a place
To people with just common folks.

Not they the warriors who shall win
Upon the battlefield a name
To sound the awful din;
Not theirs the painter's deathless fame;
Not theirs the poet's muse that rings
The rhythmic gift his soul invokes;
Theirs but to do the simple things
That duty gives just common folks.

Fate has not lifted them above
The level of the human plane;
They share with men a fellow love
In touch with pleasure and with pain.
One great, far-reaching brotherhood,
With common burdens, common yokes,
And common wrongs and common good—
God's army of just common folks.

An Unconscious Matchmaker.

Do tell me, old fellow, how on earth it is possible for such a metamorphosis to have taken place. Not a month ago we sat here, two hardened bachelors, determined to remain so to the end of our days, and now I find you transformed into a most devoted husband."

A hearty laugh was the immediate answer to this outburst, and Dr. Trenton, to whom it was addressed, took a puff at his pipe before replying.

"Well, you see, Jim," he said, "I thought it would be fun to surprise you thoroughly for once. But Delia shall tell you the story, and you may be surprised to learn that you yourself, unconsciously, I admit, made up the match."

"I suppose it is for penance, Will, that I am to narrate my own mistakes and misdeeds to Mr. Allison. Two months ago I was a stupid little country girl. My eldest brother had sent for me to keep his house. Our parents have been dead many years and I had lived with an aunt. Henry, my brother, had written me that it would be impossible for him to meet me at the depot, and that I should drive to the Tudor Flats, where he was living on the fourth floor. My poor brain was certainly in a whirl after my long drive through the noisy streets. When I arrived at the Tudor Flats I walked bravely up the stairs.

"I know you will laugh at me dreadfully, Mr. Allison, but you must remember that I had never before seen so many stairs. In my ignorance I was unaware that the entresol does not count; therefore, when I arrived at a landing where a door was ajar and an old man servant replying to an inquirer the the doctor would not be home until 2 o'clock, I naturally concluded that I had reached my journey's end, for my brother also bears the title doctor. To old James' astonishment I walked calmly in, saying:

"'The doctor expects me. Please have my luggage seen to.'

"'But, miss, I don't know,' he ventured, 'I have the strictest orders never to allow any one to enter my master's study during his absence.'

"'I am the doctor's sister, and he himself arranged my coming,' I answered, condescendingly.

"With that he admitted me, muttering: 'Never heard about a sister,' into the smoky, dusty apartments, which I assumed to be my brother's.

"Much to James' consternation, I set to work and dusted furniture and books, spread a clean cloth on the table, and prepared a lunch (though James informed me 'Master never eats at home') of fresh butter, home-made bread, cheese, ham and apples; then decorated the room with roses and honeysuckle brought from home.

"To pass away the time, I took up a book and began to read. A note fell out of this book. My eyes fell on the first words and my attention was instantly attracted. It was signed Charlie Allison, and read:

"'Dear Old Man: So you have decided to install that awful creature in your house, though you acknowledge that all hopes of peace and comfort of your life will be gone. My dear fellow, do be advised and give up this preposterous idea. At any rate, don't be surprised if I cut your acquaintance for the present, and leave you to enjoy the company of Miss Delia. Your friend,

"CHARLIE ALLISON."

"My dear lady," interrupted Charlie, "you don't mean to say—it isn't possible that any misunderstanding arose out of that? My dislike and——"

"I do mean to say so," she replied, laughing; "it was quite possible—indeed, natural—I should assume that those words referred to me. I was at first highly indignant and then began to cry. My resolution was soon formed; I would go away at once and not ever see the heartless brother who had discussed me in such a manner before my rival.

"While repacking my bag I came upon a photograph of myself. A sudden impulse made me write a few words on the back of it and leave it on the table. Then I heard steps outside. It was Henry, I thought. He should not find me there. Seeing the door of a small room open, I slipped in and closed it behind me."

"Let me tell the rest," interrupted the doctor; "I fancied I was dreaming as I became aware of the invitingly spread table; then I noted two covers laid as if for a delightful tete-a-tete, and upon my napkin a photograph of the sweetest face I had ever seen. Listen to what was written under it:

"'As I am so ugly; as I destroy your peace and drive away your friends, I leave you to lunch alone and shall find a home elsewhere.'

"While puzzling about what this might mean, I heard a terrific yell from Delia, my parrot; I opened the storeroom door and Delia, my wife, fell into my arms.

"After explanations had been made I restored her to brother Henry as housekeeper, but claimed her in five weeks for my own. Now do you believe that you are a matchmaker?"—Boston Post.

RUSHING INTO THE CITIES.

Young Men Invite Failure by Essaying Untried Fields.

Some published fragments of the new census statistics are very depressing to the old-fashioned, yet very sensible, people who have been hoping that the movement of villagers and country people to the large cities had been checked.

What is the meaning of the continuous rush to the cities? The old explanation was that farmers' sons and daughters wearied of work that was never finished; they had heard of city demands for labor and of city wages, payable always in cash and at stated dates. They had also heard of city pleasures, some of which were said to cost nothing, while others were very cheap. But young people do not constitute the whole body of people who are crowding into the cities, for mechanics and artisans of all kinds are in the throng, for in the villages and country districts employment is irregular and pay uncertain. The more aspiring of them hope for the larger opportunities and recognition that the country dares not promise; they know, too, that such of their children as incline to study may become fairly, even highly, educated in the city without special cost to their parents. Of the "seamy" side of city life they know nothing, for their acquaintances who "went to town" have not returned to tell of it; few of them could return if they would. The few who go back to the old homesteads are the men who have succeeded, and in any village such a man in effect resembles a gold-laden miner from Cape Nome or the Klondike—his example threatens to depopulate the town.

Nevertheless the rural districts are not going to be depopulated, except when their soil is very poor and their malaria overrich. A countryward movement started in some cities a few years ago and it has been increasing in volume, it may be almost invisible in some localities, for 3,000,000 square miles is an area so great that any city's overflow might be lost in it. The men who are trying scientific farming are all from the cities and they have carried their city ideas with them. As a rule, city brain and city money are suggesting and backing the rural attempts to have good roads, pure water, perfect drainage, high farming, high-grade schools, free libraries and many other ameliorations of old-time conditions. Yet in one respect the city man in the country is a disappointment to all classes of the dissatisfied, for when they talk of going to the city he persistently says, "Don't," and he supports his advice with a dismal array of facts and figures.—Saturday Evening Post.

The American Is Vulgar.

"We must all agree that the American has beyond other men an innate respect for women and for helpless things," writes "An American Mother" in the Ladies' Home Journal. "He has usually, too, a wide acquaintance with the world which hinders him from intolerance and vanity. He has also a tact too fine to blurt out unpleasant facts to his companions, as does the Englishman, who, quite unprovoked, hurls disagreeable truths at you with a ferocity and a gusto that is indecent. A week with your dearest English friends is enough to make you in love with lying. The dearer you are to them the more likely are they to talk incessantly of the mole on your nose, or your vulgar kinsfolk. The American has a vivacity almost French: he gives himself easily to the occasion: he is ready to weep and laugh with you, and is sincerely interested in your new bicycle or baby. At the same time he has something of the phlegm of the Asiatic, and seldom frets or grumbles. He sniffs the odors of foul drains, quaffs typhoid germs in his water, sits in overheated steam cars and stands in overcrowded street cars year after year with imperturbable good humor.

"Why, with all these qualities—why is he not a more agreeable fellow? Why, with all the traits that go to make up a courtly gentleman—why is he vulgar? Simply because he is not certain of his own position. He asserts himself every moment lest you may mistake him for an inferior. This uneasy self-assertion is the explanation of all our bad manners. 'I'm as good as you!' is the secret thought with which too many of us meet every fellow-creature."

An Epitaph for Ruskin.

The London Academy has awarded a prize of one guinea to J. R. Anderson, Lairbeck, Keswick, for the best inscription suitable for the proposed medallion of John Ruskin in Westminster Abbey. Mr. Anderson's epitaph is as follows:

He Taught Us
To Hold
In Loving Reverence
Poor Men and Their Work
Great Men and Their Work
God and His Work.

In connection with this competition it is interesting to quote what Ruskin himself said on epitaphs: "Take care that some memorial is kept of men who deserve memory in a distinct statement on the stone or brass of their tombs, either that they were true men or rascals—wise men or fools. How beautiful the variety of sepulchral architecture might be, in any extensive place of burial, if the public would meet the small expense of thus expressing its opinions in a verily instructive manner, and if some of the tombstones accordingly terminated in fools' caps, and others, instead of crosses and cherubs, bore engravings of cats-o'-nine-tails as typical of the probable methods of entertainment in the next world of the persons not, it is to be hoped, reposing below.

Key to the Working-Girl's Success.

"Whatever vocation the girl wageworker settles upon she may as well accept the fact, first as last, that slipshod performance and inadequate equipment will win no favor, will not even secure a foothold," writes Margaret E. Sangster in the Ladies' Home Journal. "The ranks are everywhere crowded, and the second-rate work must go to the wall. In most fields the supply is well in excess of the demand, and only the capable, the efficient, the competent and the trustworthy may hope to find their niche. As a grain of satisfaction let it be added that those possessed of these desirable qualities, those who are ready for service and are responsible in their work, are sure to be appreciated and will never cease to be wanted."

FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

A COLUMN OF PARTICULAR INTEREST TO THEM.

Something that Will Interest the Juvenile Members of Every Household—Quaint Actions and Bright Sayings of Many Cute and Cunning Children.

All the children were begging for a story. Uncle Hal had told so many tales that there was scarcely a new subject left.

"I will tell you a sad story about a cat," he said at last. "It was a kitten and it belonged to a little girl named Rose. Now, this kitten was black and had long fur, but during the winter it felt the cold, especially nights, so the kind cook used to leave the oven door open and there it slept all night."

"On the oven door?" asked Charlie, seriously.

"Oh, no. In the oven, the lower oven, where the wood was kept to dry. The fires were out, and with the doors open the oven was just comfortably warm. Then in the early morning the cook would call the kitten out and shut the door before she started the fire.

"One morning she came down and found the oven door shut. She was very busy and did not even think of the kitten. Of course if the door had been open she would have remembered, but she started the fire, and a good hot fire it was. When Rose came down she ran into the kitchen and looked around eagerly.

"'Where is Kitty?' she asked.

"The cook dropped a pan. 'Goodness gracious,' she cried. She knew that the beer she had drunk before going to bed had made her head a little muddled, and now she wished she had not touched it, for then the oven door would not be found shut. She ran to the stove, which was nearly red hot by that time, and when she opened the door and looked in, she found that the poor, little kitten——"

"Was all burned up," cried May with tears in her eyes.

"Oh, Uncle Hal!" exclaimed Charlie.

"The poor little thing!" wailed Edna.

Uncle Hal looked gravely around the circle of sorrowful faces.

"She found that the poor, little kitten," he repeated slowly, "hadn't slept in the oven at all, for the door had been shut all night. She was out in the wood shed in a basket of chips."

"Oh!" cried all the children in chorus, and then they laughed together, and Uncle Hal laughed with them.

Optimism vs. Pessimism.

1. Two girls examined a bush. One observed that it had a rose, the other that it had a thorn.

2. Two children were gathering flowers. One said that the flowers were plentiful, the other that the sun was hot.

3. Two friends were scaling the Alps. One exclaimed at the grandeur of the scenery, the other at the steepness of the ascent.

4. Two children looked through colored glasses. One said, "The world is bright," the other said, "The world is blue."

5. Two people were out on the sea in a boat. One admired the beauty of the waves, the other complained that they rocked the boat.

6. Two boys went out to fly a kite. One thought the kite mounted finely, the other grumbled that the string tangled.

7. Two people listened to the song of a bird. One said, "How beautiful the notes," the other said, "How short the song."

New people movin' in right next door!
So now I won't fret and fuss no more.
For I can see just all they do,
An' maybe in summer hear 'em, too!
For we allus open winders wide
So's to get the air on ev'ry side.
Course there'll be talkin' an' lots of noise,
That is, if the children's only boys.
Hope there is children, for, oh! dear me!
How tough an' miserable 'twould be
If only old folks should move in there!
Oh, I'd be so mad! Well, I don't care—
They've a dog, I know, for I saw him
And I heard the woman call him Jim.
(I'd call him over here if I dared,
An' didn't suppose the woman cared).
There's a baby carriage, and that shows
That they have a baby, I suppose.
And there's another one for a doll!
I'll bet there isn't a boy at all.
Oh, yes, there is, for there goes his wheel.
My, but I'm glad! I'd just like to squeal!
An' now I can see him ev'ry day
Mountin' his wheel and ridin' away.
Maybe he'll holler an' say "Hullo!
Old fellow, look down an' see me go."
He plays baseball, for there is his bat,
An' maybe he'll talk to me of that,
An' tell me of the nines, their runs and all.
I do hope he loves to talk of ball.
An' some day the dog will come in, too,
An' we can teach him a trick or two—
To speak for his food or lie down dead,
Jump through a hoop or stand on his head.
Guess 'twould take that boy a good long while
To read all through the books in that pile.
There goes his sled, an' I s'pose he skates
An' cuts pigeon wings an' figure eights.
There's a fishing rod, doubled up fine;
That box, I s'pose, holds his hooks an' line.
Oh, there he comes! An' my! he can jump—
Clear from the steps way down to the pump.
His back is straight as a soldier's gun
An' his big brown eyes are full of fun.
I wonder now if he'll notice me,
If I sit right here where he can see,
And kinder whistle soft and yet clear,
But loud enough so he'd have to hear.
He did! An' what d'ye s'pose he did?
Why, winked and hollered, "Hullo there, kid!
Can you catch?" An' the first thing I knew
A big red apple came sailin' through
The winder, right square into my lap,
An' he turned away, liftin' his cap.
So now I shan't fret an' fuss no more,
For now I've a neighbor boy next door,
An' I'm sure my back and ugly crutch
Won't bother me now—so very much.

"He'll Do."

"He'll do," said a gentleman, decisively, speaking of an office boy who had been in his employ but a single day.

"What makes you think so?"

"Because he gives himself up so entirely to the task in hand. I watched him while he swept the office, and although a procession, with three or four brass bands in it, went by the office while he was at work, he paid no attention to it, but swept on as if the sweeping of that room was the only thing of any consequence on this earth at that time. Then I set him to addressing some envelopes, and although there were a lot of picture-papers and other papers on the desk at which he sat, he paid no attention at all to them, but kept right on addressing those envelopes until the last one of them was done. He'll do, because he is thorough and dead in earnest about everything."

You may be naturally a very smart person; you may be so gifted that you can do almost anything; but all that you do will lack perfection, if you do not do it with all of your heart and strength.

MARVELS OF MECHANISM.

Automatons that Have Excited the Wonder of European Travelers.

Some years ago a jeweler of Boulogne, France, constructed a wonderful automatic conjurer. This figure, correctly dressed in black, performed various sleight-of-hand tricks with remarkable dexterity, and when it was applauded gracefully saluted the spectators to the right and left. One of its tricks was the following: It struck a table several times, and made an egg come out of it. It then blew upon the latter, when out of it came a bird that flapped its wings and sang, and afterward entered the egg again.

This, however, was nothing as compared with the automatic fly manufactured by John Miller and which flew around the table during a dinner and alighted upon the hand of its owner and manufacturer, to the great astonishment of the guests.

Another wonderful piece of mechanism was a minute coach, to which were harnessed several horses, and which rolled over the table. Upon starting the coachman cracked his whip and the horses began to prance, and then became quiet and started off on a trot. The coach stopped, and the lackey jumped from his seat, and, opening the door, handed out a handsomely dressed lady, who saluted and then reentered the coach. The lackey closed the door and jumped upon the box, the whip snapped and the horses galloped off.

The famous mechanical flute player was a life-long figure, standing by the side of a broken column, upon which it slightly leaned. It was capable of playing a dozen different airs with remarkable ease. To effect this result there was a system of weights that actuated a bellows placed in the interior of the automaton, and through an invisible tube forced air to the flute, where it acted in the usual way upon the stopple of the opening. In order to obtain the modulations, and consequently a complete air, the fingers of the automaton were movable and closed the holes of the flute hermetically when at rest. The fingers were moved by wires and cords that were tautened and relaxed by the play of a toothed cylinder.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

The Dog Laughed.

The proprietor of a Third avenue store owns a little black kitten that cultivates a habit of squatting on its haunches, like a bear or a kangaroo, and then sparring with its forepaws as if it had taken lessons from a pugilist.

A gentleman took into the store the other evening an enormous black dog, half Newfoundland, half collie, fat, good-natured, and intelligent. The tiny black kitten, instead of bolting at once for shelter, retreated a few paces, sat erect on its hind legs, and "put its fists" in an attitude of defiance. The contrast in size between the two was intensely amusing. It reminded one of Jack the Giant Killer preparing to demolish a giant.

Slowly and without a sign of excitability the huge dog walked as far as his chain would allow him, and gazed intently at the kitten and its odd posture. Then, as the comicality of the situation struck him, he turned his head and shoulders around to the spectators, and if animal ever laughed in the world that dog assuredly did so then and there. He neither barked nor growled, but indulged in a low chuckle, while eyes and mouth beamed with merriment.

LIGHT AT SMALL COST.

DEVICE PERFECTED WHICH WILL BURN AIR.

Globes Filled with Always Luminous Metal and Others Containing Phosphorescent Microbes — Late Inventions About Ready for the Market.

Undoubtedly one of the most remarkable features of the Paris exhibition just closed has been the multiplicity of curious and novel systems for producing light. In electricity the extraordinary electric lamp that must be lighted with a match proved one of the triumphs of the German section. In gas-lighting the portable boxes of a Paris company have already found their way into general use. Acetylene, that peculiar French discovery and invention, astonished the visitor by its white effulgence all along the Seine, between the new bridge and the Street of Nations. The powerful new American petroleum lamps on the Quai des Tuilleries show that old-fashioned "coal oil" is still to be heard from. In the exhibition grounds and on the Paris boulevard the alcohol lamps with incandescent gas burners compete with the electric light. More curious still and full of a vague promise are the mysterious psychological and luminous metallic lamps. Finally, the scientists and capitalists of Paris are whispering together over something in the municipal and house-lighting line that is absolutely sensational. The discovery or invention contemplates the disintegration at the burner of common air, pumped through the mains—air that costs nothing but the pumping. The great question is which is to be the cheapest and the best. Gas and electric lighting companies may or may not have to go into liquidation; in any case, the honest citizen may hope at last to come into his own at no distant day.

I first noticed the "fountains" of this canned-gas company at the exhibition, but they are now doing business on the Rue Auber, beside the Grand Opera, and are beginning to extend their business all over Europe. It is in the full tourist quarter, and I fancy there have been few Americans in Paris this summer who have not stood in admiration before the simple-looking device displayed in those show windows by which the suburbanite and the farmer equally with the dweller in cities may enjoy gas-lighting all over his house. These gas fountains—using the word in the French sense—are long, narrow metal boxes, standing upright, of solid construction, to hold compressed illuminating gas, that by means of rubber tubes is led to incandescent burners by way of movable lamps like those that stand on center tables in America. This is the story of the "fountains;" but simple as it is, how is it that no one thought of it before

The gas boxes, sold to the consumer at $5 each, require only to be taken home and set up on shelves. Three form the regulation "battery" for a moderate-sized house, lighting the three rooms which the French light brilliantly—the dining-room, the ante-chamber and the kitchen.

EAT THE FAT OF THE LAND.

Natives of Burgundy Are Well Provided With Edible Necessities.

In the morning many eat gaudes, a porridge, made of Indian corn flour mixed with milk, or a soup maigre with cream, then curds, or goat's cheese, or a peculiar kind, home-made, called formage fort, a well-deserved name, for I have never seen a woman partake of it. It is made of dried curds and old goat's cheese kept in wood ashes for a year, the two grated and mixed together with salt, pepper, brandy and sometimes garlic. When it has subsided the whole presents the appearance of yellowish, sticky, strong-smelling, curdled cream—far from appetizing in my opinion, which is not, however, that of a great many male Burgundians. White wine is the general beverage at breakfast.

For the midday meal there is often salt pork (cured at home), boiled with different kinds of vegetables—cabbages, potatoes, turnips, beans, carrots or peas—the broth being utilized for soup in the evening. As a change, the wives prepare occasionally a ragout de mutton, sometimes a pot au feu for Sunday dinner, and the people thereabout, being extremely sociable, they invite each other frequently, and do not mind sacrificing ducks, fowls, geese, pigeons or rabbits in honor of their guests. Large quantities of salads, radishes and fruit are eaten in their season, and eggs, milk, curds and cream throughout the year.

Mercerey produces vast quantities of fruits—apples, pears, cherries, apricots, almonds, nuts and medlars; but its [illegible] deservedly renowned. They [illegible] grown as hardy fruit in the vineyards and receive the sun's rays without shelter of any kind; the warm showers of thunder-storms (very frequent there) wash the dust from their velvet coats, while the soft summer breezes soon dry off all moisture, leaving them at last in the perfection of their delicious ripeness and purple-hued beauty. These are the edible peaches. There is another sort called white ones, used for making brandy, but seldom eaten, being greatly inferior to the red kind.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Plans for a Long Drive.

In a wonderful wagon drawn by two gray horses sixteen hands high, and with a yellow dog mascot as his companion, the Baron Herman De Twigh will start from Hoboken for a three months' drive across country to the City of Mexico. The yellow dog cost the baron 25 cents. The wagon cost a small fortune. It is not only a house on wheels, but an arena and a fort. In shape it somewhat resembles a wagonette. It has a top, light sides, but no windows. The sides, however, disappear at the touch of a spring. From the wagon top a big awning may be extended in the air automatically so as to form a complete tent.

Every panel of the wagon inside and out opens by a spring and reveals a store place for provisions and supplies. Another spring turns two seats inside the wagon into a comfortable bed, and under the driver's seat is a store of arms ranging all the way from a small pistol to a Maxim rapid-fire gun. The baron is over 60 years old. His home is at 349 Central avenue, West Hoboken. He came to this country from Holland forty years ago, and has spent most of his time in the West as a civil engineer.—New York Sun.

Metric System in Russia.

The Russian Minister of Finance has, says a St. Petersburg correspondent of the London Daily Mail, definitely decided to introduce the metric system of weights and measures into Russia. St. Petersburg, Moscow and half a dozen other great cities will have their first experience of the reform on Jan. 14, 1901, and the rest of the country will be gradually permeated with it in the course of five years. There is a feeling, too, abroad in Australia that with the coming commonwealth should be introduced a currency based upon the decimal system.

A Land of Poverty.

It is in Russia's most fertile districts that the worst famines occur, for famine—a little one every year, a big one every seven years—has now become a regular occurrence. And the country, as one flies across it, leaves the general impression of indigence. In sharp and painful contrast with Western Europe there are virtually no fat stack yards, no cozy farmhouse, no chateau of the local landowner, no squire's hall—pitiful assemblages of men and women just on the hither side of the starvation line.

Minutes of previous days' meeting were read and approved.

A petition from the citizens of Bishop asking for an alteration in the county road running north from Leece & Watterson's corner in Bishop, accompanied by the required bond, was received and discussed at length, and action thereon postponed until afternoon.

Proclamation of Governor Gage, approving the cattle quarantine line and the rules and regulations governing the same established by the State Veterinary Surgeon, was read and filed.

Bills were examined and allowed on various funds as follows:

I J Woodin, Hospital Fund		$10 00
J D Mairs	"	3 50
Inyo Lodge I.O.O.F.	"	5 00
John Keegan	"	7 00

Board adjourned until 1 o'clock p. m., at which time reconvened with all members present as before.

Deed from Clara A. Cross to Inyo County for a strip of land 2½ rods wide and running the length of the north line of her land in Warm Springs School District, was received and accepted, and the land so deeded declared a county road.

The said above described land was purchased from Mrs. Cross for the County of Inyo by Wm. Watterson, with the understanding that the county would grant him a right of way for a waste ditch from the SW corner of the Warm Springs school lot easterly to the Case slough; therefore, in consideration of the above described deed, the right of way is hereby granted to Wm. Watterson for a waste ditch from the SW corner of the Warm Springs school lot to the Case slough, about one-half mile distant in an easterly direction. Said ditch to be constructed directly south of the present course of the Yandell and Case ditch.

In the matter of the petition of the citizens of Bishop asking for alterations in the county road running north from Leece & Watterson's corner in Bishop, Supervisor Yaney was appointed to confer with the parties asking for the changes.

Be it Resolved: That it is the sense of the Board that if the parties asking for said alterations will furnish deeds from property owners to the county for rights of way for road, over whose lands the road would run in straightening the east line of the street from Geo. W. Dixon's NW corner in a straight line to W. G. McCrosky's SW corner, and put the road as changed in a condition acceptable to the Supervisors of Districts Nos. 1 and 2, without expense to the County, then in consideration thereof the Board will abandon all that part of the road lying west of a straight line running northerly from the present corner of Leece & Watterson's store to the SE corner of I. P. Yaney's ranch.

Allan Matlick and I. F. Smith, together with the County Suveyor, were appointed Viewers, subject to the call of the Supervisor of the 2d District, to view and lay out the said proposed road.

Board adjourned to meet January 12, 1901, at 9 o'clock a. m.

DIED.

JAMES—At Independence, Inyo Co., Cal., January 12, 1901, WALTER JAMES, a native of England, aged 65 years.

The Big Pine public school will arrange for an entertainment on Washington's Birthday.

Beef cattle to the number of 350 head have been shipped by railroad during the past two weeks. It is rumored that the selling rates were $45 per head.

Dr. Woodin's left ankle is enfolded with a plaster caste, arranged by Dr. Blair. The sprain is not a serious hurt, but—to reiterate an ancient joke—other patients may get well, ad interim.

Another investigation, during the past two weeks, by experts, has been made anent the oil fields on the southwestern borders of Owens Lake. In the interest of capitalistic investors an immense section of country thereabouts has been located. This statement comes well authenticated. General, or specific, details will follow.

The first session of the nearly new Board of Supervisors passed with routine of business, under laws made and provided for the government of counties, all of which procedings appear in the published minutes. Within all limitations of power we expect a good economic record from the managers.

Walter James "crossed the range" on Saturday last, and was on the following day buried at Odd Fellows Cemetry by many of his old time friends. He was among the earliest of the English miners who came to this valley to work the Eclipse mine, and has resided in Independence since 1872. His son, Walter, resides in Tulare county, and his daughter, Mrs. C. S. Meroney, resides at Bakersfield.

In the Legislative reapportionment all political gerymandering and consideration of exact population should be sidetracked, in view of the relative geography of the Assembly district comprising Alpine, Inyo and Mono counties. The princible has, in pure justice, been recognized by the State since 1872, and has since been upheld for reasons that are cogent now as then. It has always been haphazzard as to the political bent of our Representatives; the people don't care as to a man's political brand, nor are their souls involved in the cause of any United States Senatorial candidate. We have hope that the present organization of our Assembly district will not be disturbed, mainly from the circumstance that Kern county has honored itself and Inyo and Mono by having sent John W. P. Laird to legislative councils.

Thanks.

We wish to express our hearty thanks to our many friends and neighbors, for their acts of kindness and sympathy shown us in our late sorrow.

JOHN KISPERT and FAMILY.

Tired Eyes.

A correspondent of Popular Science News tells of a party of Alpine climbers who, having spent five hours among the snows of the mountains, returned to their homes after dark. A great change had to all appearance taken place since the night before. Instead of being illuminated in the usual way, the place was supplied with green lights.

It took the travelers a little time to realize that they were suffering from Daltonism, or color blindness, superinduced by eye fatigue. The intense light caused by the sun shining upon the snow had for the time rendered them unable to judge of colors and given rise to their curious mistake. Three hours elapsed before the eyes regained their normal condition.

Chevreul explains that the eye cannot gaze long upon a given color without tending to become insensible to it. When the eye looks long upon a color, it should be rested by the complementary color. Thus an eye that has grown tired with green should be rested by red, which is green's complementary color.

One Thing and Another

I consider corn fodder better feed for stock than pasture, especially when the pasture is run down, as so many are in the western states. I prefer to cut, for feed, corn that was planted late and that has rather small ears. This makes a splendid feed for all kind of stock, says a Prairie Farmer correspondent.

July is the critical month for corn, and The Kansas Farmer says that a more favorable month than it has been in the Kansas corn belt can scarcely be imagined.

SEED CORN SELECTION.

Different Varieties For Upland and Bottom Lands.

Many farmers owning both bottom and upland cornfields make the mistake of using the same seed on both kinds of soil. Corn which is adapted to the soil and moisture conditions of the valleys will not do so well on the upland as will some variety that has by several years of cultivation and selection become adapted to the conditions there. It is for the same reason that the large Colorado potatoes that have been grown for years under irrigation will do so poorly when used for seed in Kansas without the accustomed supply of water, says J. M. Westgate of the state station. It is generally the case on the farm that the corn from all the fields, both upland and bottom, is cribbed together. When the time for seed selection comes, the largest ears are picked out, irrespective of the kind of soil that grew them. As the bottom land produces the larger ears it is more than likely that the bulk of the seed will be from the lower and moister portions of the farm. This is the proper seed for the lowland, but it is not so well adapted to the dryer and poorer upland as is seed that has been raised there. It is advisable to select the seed either before or at husking time, when not only the quality of the ground, but the character of the individual stalk and ear can be taken into consideration. As has been suggested before, a small box attached to the side of the wagon bed, into which the desired ears can be thrown, is the most practical device that can be recommended. By a little judicious selection for a series of years a strain can be established on the upland portion of any farm which will be well adapted to that and other soils similar to location and composition. An eight inch ear from the upland will ordinarily prove better for planting on the upland than will a 12 inch ear from the lower portions of the farm.

Time to Sow Grass Seed.

No other hay grass is so well known in this state as timothy. It is in general use throughout the northern Mississippi valley, where it is indeed one of the most valuable of our grasses. It is customary to sow this grass in the early spring, either with a nurse crop like oats and wheat, or to sow it by itself, or in some cases it is sown with clover. It seems to me it is advisable to sow this seed in the fall. I have seen numerous fields sown in the fall which gave large crops the next season. It has become quite common to sow timothy in the fall in southwestern Wisconsin and northeastern Iowa. The land should be well plowed, pulverized and cleaned. Then the grass seed is ready to be sown. The following has proved valuable on my father's farm in southwestern Wisconsin and certainly is advisable also for northeastern Iowa: Sow in early September at the rate of five quarts of timothy or four quarts of timothy to one quart of clover without a nurse crop. The hay crop the next season will be about two tons to the acre. If not allowed to seed, the clover will disappear the second year, says L. H. Pammell of Iowa in Prairie Farmer.

A Rye Sod Kills Potato Scab.

Alva Agee makes a very interesting potato note in the Ohio Farmer. He says:

"Another year's experience confirms my statement made a year ago in The Farmer that one can control potato scab by the use of a rye sod, if this is done in the right way. This is the fifth year of an experiment on two acres of land that had become so infested with scab that a decent crop of potatoes could not be grown. Five successive crops of potatoes have been grown in this land, turning a rye sod under each spring, and the seed used a portion of the time has not been wholly free from scab and has been untreated with any solution to kill the germs, but the crop is above the average in smoothness. The seed last spring, coming from northern Ohio, had more scab than seemed safe, but so far as examination of the hills now indicates the crop will be all right. If the rye can be turned during a hot spell in the spring, it makes the soil a little acid, and that is fatal to the scab germs. Two years of that treatment practically cleaned the field."

Proved His Theory, but Died.

The acme of realism was reached, though by accident, in a criminal trial a few years ago at Lebanon, O.

Two men had a personal encounter. One of them, after vainly trying to draw his pistol from his hip pocket, turned to flee. A moment later he fell, shot in the small of the back. One chamber of his pistol was found to have been fired. His assailant was tried for murder.

The defense contended that the man had shot himself while trying to draw his pistol, which had become entangled in the lining of the pocket, and that the prisoner's shot had not taken effect. The prosecution contended that such a wound could not have been self inflicted.

The defendant's counsel, Clement L. Vallandigham, undertook to demonstrate to the jury just how the dead man's pistol had hung in the pocket and just how possible it was to inflict such a wound. Suddenly there was a loud report, and the lawyer sank to the floor. The ball had entered the back almost in the identical spot where the dead man had been shot.

The defendant was acquitted. Mr. Valandigham died.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Uses of the Music Roll.

Enter girl with that subtle air of refinement which belongs only to such as earn their living and are ashamed of it.

"I wish to look at music rolls," she says.

Smiles the clerk affably.

"Here is something very fine," he says. "We guarantee that butter won't soak through it so as to show on the outside."

Yes, the habit of eating certainly does get people into awkward situations now and then.—Detroit Journal.

His Only Chance.

"Do you know that you talk in your sleep, Henry?" asked Mrs. Peck.

"Well, do you begrudge me those few words also?" he snapped back.—Philadelphia North American.

An Apt Answer.

The dangers associated with the fishing industry on the Newfoundland banks are many and grave. Foremost among them is that the dories may be upset while fishing, which involves the almost inevitable loss of their occupants. Callous captains, secure themselves from the necessity of going, frequently order their men out when the weather does not warrant it, and disastrous are the result. One of these brutal skippers was aptly answered last year by a bank man of whose courage or capacity there was no question.

"Out with you!" shouted the captain. "Hurry up there! It's a fishing day."

"Oh, no, skipper," replied the dory man. "It's too stormy today for a boat to fish."

"Nonsense, man," rejoined the skipper. "If my old grandmother from Provincetown was here today, she'd get her dory out."

"Then, skipper," said the man, "if her grandson will come out with me now I'll haul my trawl."

It is needless to say no dories were launched from that schooner on that date.—Philadelphia Ledger.

What Attracts Them.

"It is perfectly natural," said one whose own business takes him about more or less, "that a man should be interested wherever he may be in things pertaining to his own business. I know I am in mine. When I strike a strange place, I like to go through the quarter where they carry on the business that I am engaged in and see how they run things in it there. But I have lately met with two illustrations of this sort of thing that seemed to me to be rather curious as well as interesting.

"Talking with a New York paint manufacturer about paint of a certain kind, the paint man said incidentally that he had seen paint of that color on walls in Pompeii. Oddly enough, the other curious illustration arose out of the same ancient city. A New Yorker engaged in the manufacture of lead pipe said, incidentally to something that he was telling me about lead pipe, that he had found in Pompeii lead pipe in fair condition, this pipe, while covered with an incrustation that had gathered upon it in the long time it had been buried, yet cutting with as bright and perfect a cleavage as though it had been made yesterday instead of many centuries ago.

"These two things interested somewhat the paint man and the lead man respectively, and they certainly interested me."—New York Sun.

He Believed the Sign.

It was a newly opened furnishing store, and one window was resplendent with neckties and cravats of glorious brilliancy. Confidently they announced in gilt letters, "Any article removed from the windows." So when Smithson walked in and requested to see that "bright pink and green shot with peacock blue in the front row" the polite salesman disarranged the front and after some considerable trouble brought out the desired object.

"Rather loud, isn't it?" remarked Smithson.

The affable salesman was in complete accord. "Certainly it is striking."

"I thought so. You needn't put it back."

"Very well, sir," and the man began to wrap up the thing of beauty in its bed of tissue paper. "Anything else today, sir?"

"Oh, I don't want it," said Smithson, "only you know you advertise, 'Any article taken from the window,' and as this hideous thing offends my æsthetic taste I thought I'd ask you to remove it, that's all. Good day."

Then that salesman philosophized audibly and with much fervor.

The Shortest Address.

People who are universally known do not require elaborate addresses. Probably in any civilized country a letter simply addressed to "The Pope" would reach its destination, with at most the addition of the word Rome. Similarly, "The President, Washington," would be quite intelligible, though if the letter had to pass through lands using different languages or scripts some of the words might have to be duplicated in translation.

The French journal Le Soir once called attention to the fact that some names are found in France consisting of one letter only. At the registration of the birth of a child at Gagny, near Paris, it transpired that the mother's name was Rose B, not as an initial, but as her full surname.

In Belgium there are several families of the name of O, one Therese O having kept a shop in Brussels some years ago. Further, there is a parish of Y in the neighborhood of Peronne. By no extravagant fancy, therefore, there might exist a gentleman whose address should consist of three letters only, "M. O., Y."

Quick Witted.

"It was simply an exhibition of nerve and quick wit," said the old banker who was dining at his club with a number of friends. "No one but the paying teller knew what was happening at the time, and what might have been a tragedy was turned into a comedy by his quick wit.

"During the noon hour one day an old man approached the paying teller and presented a check for $1,000,000. With it was a badly written letter to the effect that if the immediate payment of the check was not forthcoming the teller would have his head blown off. He was nothing but a crank, but he had come armed for business, and if the wit of the paying teller had failed him for an instant there might have been a tragedy. But the paying teller coolly took up the check, glanced at it and then handed it back with the remark that the crank had neglected to put a stamp upon it. In an instant the crank was full of apologies at his oversight and departed to get a stamp. It took but a moment to notify the police, and the crank was put where there is no danger of his demanding the payment of any more $1,000,000 checks at the point of a gun."—Detroit Free Press.

A Grateful Poet.

"Twenty years ago I wrote a poem of considerable length," said a caller in a newspaper office.

"Yes," said the editor.

"I brought it to this office, and you refused to publish it."

"Very likely."

"I remember that I mentally put you down then as an idiot who didn't know enough to ache when hurt."

"Naturally."

"Well, sir, I looked that poem over again the other day and made up my mind to come and see you about it."

"Yes."

"I have come to say that if I looked as green 20 years ago as that poem proves me to have been I want to thank you because you didn't cut me up and throw me as food to the crows. Good day."

The editor drew a long chalk mark under the table. It was the first case in all his experience in which even 20 years had begotten the knowledge that it is sometimes necessary to be cruel to be kind.—London Tit-Bits.

An Amateur Critic.

Here is a schoolboy's criticism of Sir Walter Scott in an examination paper which the New York Commercial Advertiser vouches for: "Walter Scott was a great poit. When he was dyeing, he felt it coming on, so he wrote sum tuching lines which he ment for himself:

"The way was long the wind was cold the minstrul was inferul old.

"O may we all feel the same wen death catches hold of us."

CATARRH

Catarrh has become such a common disease that a person entirely free from this disgusting complaint is seldom met with. It is customary to speak of Catarrh as nothing more serious than a bad cold, a simple inflammation of the nose and throat. It is, in fact, a complicated and very dangerous disease; if not at first, it very soon becomes so.

The blood is quickly contaminated by the foul secretions, and the poison through the general circulation is carried to all parts of the system.

Salves, washes and sprays are unsatisfactory and disappointing, because they do not reach the seat of the trouble. S. S. S. does. It cleanses the blood of the poison and eliminates from the system all catarrhal secretions, and thus cures thoroughly and permanently the worst cases.

Mr. T. A. Williams, a leading dry goods merchant of Spartanburg, S. C., writes: "For years I had a severe case of nasal Catarrh, with all the disagreeable effects which belong to that disease, and which make life painful and unendurable. I used medicines prescribed by leading physicians and suggested by numbers of friends, but without getting any better. I then began to take S. S. S. It had the desired effect, and cured me after taking eighteen bottles. In my opinion S. S. S. is the only medicine now in use that will effect a permanent cure of Catarrh."

SSS is the only purely vegetable blood purifier known, and the greatest of all blood medicines and tonics.

If you have Catarrh don't wait until it becomes deep-seated and chronic, but begin at once the use of S. S. S., and send for our book on Blood and Skin Diseases and write our physicians about your case.

Omaha Man Greatly Prizes a Sixty-Dollar Bill He Owns.

The most unique piece of legal tender in the city, outside of the Byron Reed collection, is a $60 bill, in the possession of A. K. Rhoades, 2582 Spalding street, says the Omaha Bee. Mr. Rhoades brought the bill with him when he left Maine for the West in his early youth and it has been treasured among the family archives for forty-three years. It would probably have remained far from the public eye had it not been for the boast of a Spokane paper that a resident of that city possessed the only $60 bill in existence. Mr. Rhoades wishes Omaha to have the credit of a similar possession.

The bill was issued during the first session of the Continental Congress in 1779, and is a document of peculiar appearance. The paper is of a faded yellow material and is coarse and heavy. It is cut almost square, four inches by three. The promise to pay is worded as follows: "The bearer is entitled to receive sixty Spanish milled dollars or an equal sum in gold or silver, according to a resolution of Congress of the 14th of January, 1779." At one side is an engraving of the earth, with the motto "Deus regnat, Exultet Terra" ("The Lord reigns, let the earth rejoice"). On the obverse of the bill are sketches of two leaves, resembling a mint leaf and a sprig of pine, with the printers' signature, "Hall & Sellers, 1779."

The Byron Reed collection contains an $80 bill and several samples of continental currency of other denominations, but has no duplicate of Mr. Rhoades' treasure. Neither does the rich library on numismatics in the collection have anything to say regarding the history or value of the document. The bill bears every evidence of being genuine, however, and is undoubtedly worth far more than its face value. Mr. Rhoades values the bit of paper very highly, both as a curio and as a keepsake, and has never made any effort to ascertain its commercial worth.

Otto Fiechtl, of the Coeur d'Alene, is said to have been offered $1,000 for his specimen spoken of by the Spokane paper, but preferred not to part with it. He submitted the currency to the Treasury Department and after an examination it was reported that the bill was legal; such an issue is known to have been made in the year mentioned. The official signature inscribed in ink is that of George Bond.

Biggest of Toy Factories.

The largest toy factory in the world is in New York, where playthings in tin are manufactured literally by the million. It stands five stories high, and turns out 1,607 distinct varieties in tin toys. No. 1 is a tin horse, No. 1,607 a tin menagerie. The output of circular tin whistles is 2,000,000 per annum. To make a tin horse twelve inches long dies have to be cast costing £15. The children of different countries have different tastes, but tin swords are wanted all over the world, the military instinct being as universal in the nurseries as in the courts and cabinets of the world.

It consists of a clock phonograph combination. In place of the usual striking attachment is a phonograph, which can be set to speak a sentence at any time desired, thus becoming an unfailing reminder to its owner of the duties of each successive hour.

Waked Them Up.

It is related of an eccentric chaplain to a foreign court that he became so annoyed in consequence of his audience, or, rather, congregation, making a practice of going to sleep during his sermons that he resorted to the following "awakening" expedient.

In the midst of one of his sermons he drew forth a harmonicon from his pocket and began to play. The one or two who were still awake, astonished to see such a performance in a pulpit, awoke those who slept, and pretty soon everybody was lively as well as being filled with wonder.

This was the preacher's opportunity, for he at once commenced a most severe castigatory discourse, in the course of which he said, "When I announce to you sacred and important truths, you are not ashamed to go to sleep, but when I play the fool you are all eye and ear."

Spinning in Ireland.

The spinning wheel and the flax wheel are still found in the Irish cottages, where many a girl has her wedding dowry of linen and homespun made at home. Although it is more the task of the older women, there are still girls who do their spinning stint and lay by a certain amount for their wedding outfit.

A pleasant sight it is to see the elderly Irish women outside their cottage doors spinning the flax or the wool. As long as the weather is warm the sturdy Irish woman, old or young, scorns a roof except to sleep under. The free air and sunshine are her choice, and the sweet sky is the fairest roof.

There is still an excellent market in Dublin and London for homespun and woven goods, and many ladies of the nobility have of late done much to restore the industries of Ireland to their former place.—Harper's Bazar.

A WHOLE VILLAGE

Attacked by Grip—One Family Escapes by Using Pe-ru-na.

WINONA, STARK CO., IND.

During the winter I and my family of six were taken with la grippe. The disease was very prevalent at that time in the village where I resided, nearly every one being sick with it. Our doctors treated it as best they could, but were very unsuccessful in the treatment of it. As soon as my family were taken sick I went to the drugstore and bought six bottles of Pe-ru-na, and we all took it according to the directions given on the bottle; and although our cases seemed to be more than usually violent in the outset, yet our recovery was prompt, and we were all well much sooner than those who were treated by the regular physicians.

Many people died of this la grippe during this epidemic, and few, if any, were sick so short a time as myself and family. After we were all well we had one bottle of Pe-ru-na left.

WOMAN'S REALM

WASTE OF STRENGTH.

We are told that the greatest danger of waste of strength is during the winter season, when we feel the strongest. This is the season when most men and women feel themselves possessed of a new capital of strength and zeal. They are eager for work and overflowing with energy. It is also a time of promise, and we are apt to overlook the fact that it is a time of danger. A great deal of energy is wasted, as many other precious things are wasted, through lack of intelligence and direction. Physical and mental strength are as much a trust as any other form of property. To waste them by multiplying the sources by which they are given out, or by failing to concentrate them on things to which they ought to be directed, is an offense against one's self and against society.

It is an offense, unfortunately, of which a great many of the best people are guilty. At the beginning of the year's work select the lines to which you can give the greatest effectiveness, and hold to them with resolute persistence. Do not be distracted by the claims of things which may interest you, but to which you ought to give your energy. Put out of your account, so far as personal help is concerned, those things of which you cannot give yourself, and concentrate strength, time and energy on the one, two or three lines of work for which you are fitted, and to which you are committed. Avoid waste of strength by using it with intelligence, and by concentration of a few objects, if you would get the most out of life.

A Woman Major.

The only woman major in the United States army is Mrs. Belle L. Reynolds, of Santa Barbara, Cal. Mrs. Reynolds is a native of Massachusetts. When 14 years old she removed to the West, and at the opening of the Civil War, when her husband enlisted in the Seventeenth Illinois, she joined him at Bird's Point, Mo., commencing a life of three years in the camp and on the field, helping the wounded and sick. After the battle of Pittsburg Landing she received her commission from Governor Yates of Illinois. She was at Vicksburg, Miss., when Gen. Grant dared the experiment of running the batteries, and she entered that city with the triumphant army. After the war she studied medicine in Chicago and became a practitioner. Later she removed to Santa Barbara. When trouble arose in the Philippines she went there as a Red Cross nurse. She has since returned home.

MRS. REYNOLDS.

Warning to Women.

Women are humorously warned against too many distractions by the following:

Here lies a poor woman who always was busy,
She lived under pressure that rendered her dizzy.
She belonged to ten clubs, knew Browning by sight,
Shone at luncheons and teas, and would vote if she might.
She served on a school board with courage and zeal;
She golfed and kodaked and rode on a wheel;
She read Tolstoy and Ibsen; knew microbes by name,
Approved of Delsarte; was a "daughter" and "dame."
Her children went in for top education;
Her husband went seaward for nervous prostration.
One day on her tablets she found an hour free,
The shock was too great, and she died instantly.

Heroine of Pekin.

Miss Cecile Payen, the Chicago portrait painter, who shared with Mrs. and Miss Woodward, of Evanston, the long siege of Pekin, reached Chicago recently. Miss Payen gives an interesting description of the siege, which, she says, was not so black as it was painted, one of the chief troubles of those within the walls being the thought of the anxious ones at home. She was just completing a portrait when the first scare came to the legation, and after the momentary excitement had died away she persuaded her sitter to give her another hour, in which she completed the picture.

MISS PAYEN.

The Betrothed Couple.

To announce an engagement the young couple write personal notes to their respective relatives and near friends, who pass on the pleasant news to the world at large. The notes often mention one or more afternoons when the young woman will be at home to receive her friends informally with her mother. The groom's friends also take this opportunity of making her acquaintance.

At news of a betrothal, friends hasten to extend invitations for various festivities to the happy pair, and the families interested exchange hospitalities.

The engagement ring is presented when the engagement is announced—or at least it is then openly worn, its choice depending upon the taste and means of the giver.

The engaged man is congratulated, but one wishes the girl all happiness.

It is the present fashion for intimate friends to send to the fiancee engagement presents in the shape of teacups. The lovers are seen often together in public, as they are not supposed to care for gayeties apart from each other. They should not make themselves conspicuous by their devotion to each other.

Many persons prefer not to announce their engagement until there is a prospect of the marriage taking place within a year. An engaged girl should only accept from her lover such gifts as might be returned uninjured should the engagement be broken.—Mrs. Burton Kingsland, in Ladies' Home Journal.

Progressive Women.

Miss Sarah Flanagan is city clerk of Kingston, Ont., possibly the only woman who has ever attained to such a position in Canada.

Miss Alice Serber, of New York, is the first woman lawyer of that city to be admitted to practice in the United States District Courts.

Miss Cora A. Wellman has been appointed by the New Hampshire Supreme Court as assignee to wind up the affairs of the Hinsdale Savings Bank.

The only woman rabbi on record is Miss Rachel Frank, who had conferred on her this distinction by a Jewish church in San Francisco.

Mrs. Ruth Schaffner Etnier has been appointed by Dr. G. G. Groff, the educational commissioner for Porto Rico, inspector of education for the district of Ponce, including over forty schools. Mrs. Schaffner Etnier is the first woman selected for such a position in the island.

The ubiquitous "American dentist," held in the highest esteem the world over for superior professional skill, has already hung out her shingle in Manila, and is finding abundant demand for her services. Dr. Anna M. Sawyer, of New York, is the woman who has taken the initiative in this instance.

One of the youngest notaries public in the country is Miss Kathryn Helmer, of St. Louis, who is 20 years old and has held the position of a notary in that city for two years.

Would Divorce Draga.

King Alexander, of Servia, has announced his intention of divorcing Queen Draga, whom he carried three months ago. He is tired of his wife and seeks the freedom of his bachelor days. But three short months ago King Alexander declared he would sooner abdicate than give up the beautiful widow who was formerly lady-in-waiting to Queen Natalie. In the face of the entire government the young king continued in his determination and finally he enlisted the kind offices of the Czar of Russia, who interceded with his father. On the day before the wedding the Czar sent the bride a magnificent necklace of diamonds and emeralds, the value of the gift being estimated at half a million francs.

MME. DRAGA.

The "Perfect" Woman.

The dimensions of a perfect woman are these: Five feet five inches in height; weight, 128 pounds. From tip to tip of each middle finger just five feet five inches, the same as her height. The length of her hand should be one-tenth of her height; her foot one-seventh, and the diameter of her chest one-fifth. From her thighs to the ground she should measure just the same as from her thighs to the top of her head. The knee should come exactly midway between the thigh and the heel. The distance from the elbow to the middle finger should be the same as from the elbow to the middle of the chest. From the top of the head to the chin should be just the length of the foot, and the same distance from the chin to the armpits. A woman of this height should measure 24 inches around the waist, 34 about the bust, if measured under the arms, and 43 if measured over them. The upper arm should measure 13 inches and the wrist six inches. The calf of the leg should measure 14½ inches, thigh 25 and the ankle eight.

Letters Should Reflect Writers.

It is a gift to be "like yourself" in your letters. Some people write as if they were talking, and their letters are always welcome to their friends because of their strong individuality. For this reason it is a disastrous mistake to cultivate a "style" in letter writing. Your letter should be a true likeness of your own mind, even if you have to make it brief. The genuine truth of your few lines will carry a message of reality to whomever they are sent.

Never write a letter in anger; this is always a mistake. You may have righteous cause for anger, but do not write until the blaze has cooled and your temper has recovered its normal serenity. It is quite bad enough to say angry words; they may be forgotten or fall upon unheeding ears. Written words last.—Ada C. Sweet, in Woman's Home Companion.

Russian Blouse.

For young women the Russian blouse in dark shades of velvet is extremely popular. It buttons up closely to the neck in front, and if any gold decoration is apparent it is found in the narrow belt, with perhaps the addition of a gold tassel or two.

The noblest motive is the public good.—Virgil.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

LIFE AND CHARACTER OF THE GREAT VIRGINIAN.

Man Who Wrote the Declaration of Independence and Who Contributed Largely to the Founding of the American Republic.

No father of the republic was more frequently or more extensively quoted in the remarkable campaign of 1900 than Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, and for this reason we take the opportunity of reproducing certain extracts from an article on his life and character contributed by John De Morgan to The Book World:

Jefferson, says the writer, was in many ways the most remarkable man of the age. His individuality stood out prominently and his earnestness and sincerity made him so conspicuous that his very name became almost synonymous with that of the republic. He was essentially the man for the time and throughout all ages, when the mists of prejudice and passion, and misrepresentation have cleared away, Jefferson will stand out on the pages of history as one of the greatest men the world has produced.

His Early Manhood.

At the age of 20 Jefferson began the study of law; he was admitted to the bar in 1767. Two years before he had listened to the eloquence of Patrick Henry when that famous speech was delivered which set the colonies ablaze with opposition to the stamp act. In 1769 he was elected a member of the House of Burgesses and at once introduced a bill giving owners a right to emancipate their slaves. The bill did not become a law until some years later.

In 1772 he was married to Martha Skelton, a young and charming widow who played the spinet to his violin and delighted to sit at his feet, her head resting on his knee, and listen for hours to his reading from his favorite authors. Theirs was an ideal union, but she did not live to share her husband's triumphs, for she died in 1782.

He was elected to the first Congress in 1775 and, in the words of John Adams, "brought with him a reputation for literature, science and a happy talent of composition." When, a year later, he was appointed Chairman of the committee to draw up a declaration of independence, his co-laborers unanimously left the matter in his hands, and from the pen of Thomas Jefferson emanated the most remarkable impeachment of an existing government and a declaration of the rights of man that ever burst on an expectant world.

Beginning in the years immediately preceding that Declaration of Independence and closing in the early part of the administration of John Quincy Adams, the writings of Thomas Jefferson are a rich depository of principles in the science of government.

He was a voluminous writer and his reflections and theories, his profound and original ideas in the realm of religion, morals, education, law, the rights of man, and other topics, are well worthy the study and attention of the people.

What He Foresaw.

He predicted that a time might come when there would arise an aristocracy of wealth, and he expressed a hope that the country would "crush in its birth the aristocracy of our moneyed corporations, which dare already to challenge our government to a trial of strength, and bid defiance to the laws of our country." He had a genuine contempt for the aristocracy of birth, and said: "An honest farmer occupies a more dignified place in the scale of beings, whether moral or political, than a lazy lounger, valuing himself on his family, too proud to work, and drawing out a miserable existence by eating on that surplus of other men's labor, which is the sacred fund of the helpless poor."

Between 1779 and 1809 Jefferson was in office either as Governor of Virginia, Minister to France, Secretary of State, Vice President or President; in every office he served the people faithfully, but made many enemies by his honesty and truth.

In Virginia a great struggle was going on in favor of religious liberty. The Established Church had become so narrow and dogmatic that all who dared to differ from it in matters of faith or politics were treated as heretics and cruelly persecuted. The church, at that time, was essentially an English institution, and many of its clergy considered it a sacred duty to preach loyalty to England; this still further antagonized many. The struggle was a fierce one, and Jefferson, naturally, became one of the leaders. He argued and worked so diligently for religious liberty that his enemies branded him as "infidel," and some called him an "atheist."

It is doubtful whether any political writer wrote so strongly in favor of true religion than did Jefferson. Some of his most eloquent sentences, some of the passages from state papers, paragraphs from private and public letters were redolent with piety and full of humble reliance on the Creator.

After his second Presidential term he retired to Monticello and spent the remaining seventeen years of his life with his books, correspondence with litterateurs in all parts of the world and in establishing the University of Virginia.

When he passed away July 4, 1826, the country lost the first and greatest of its political thinkers, a man who, beyond all others, labored to create a commonwealth in which all should be partners, instead of a republic of the few, a nation of classes. He wielded a mighty power, but, unlike many, his work was with the pen, for he was no orator. No statesman ever had so large a correspondence, and in all the thousands of letters and essays and treatises he wrote there will be found something of eternal value, for he never wrote without thought, and he never thought without developing something original or bright, something which tended to elevate the people and make the nation more free.

NEW COREAN MINISTER,

One of the Ablest Statesmen of the Hermit Kingdom.

Prince Min Tong Whan, the new Corean minister to Washington, belongs to the progressive party of his native land and is one of the foremost and most influential statesmen in the "Hermit Kingdom." Prince Min has traveled widely. He made a tour of the world when accredited as special ambassador to Queen Victoria's jubilee, going to England by way of India and the Suez canal, and traveling leisurely over the continent before going to London. He returned with his suite through the United States, which he traversed slowly, remaining for some time in the large cities, studying the customs of the people.

Prince Min remained for several weeks in Washington. During his stay in Washington the Prince, who, like all of his countrymen, acquires foreign languages easily, learned to speak English with fluency, and studied the American system of government.

and carriage that might have been acquired at West Point, an intellectual face and the grace and manners of a man of the world. He is cultivated, erudite and familiar with the history and traditions of the Occident, as well as with those of the Orient. He is, in a word, a broad-gauged, well-balanced man who may be expected to administer his legation in a way creditable both to his country and acceptable to this government.

Profits of the Passion Play.

It is a well-known fact that the actors in the Oberammergau Passion Play receive only a moderate fee for their acting, and that, whether the part played is important and fatiguing or whether it is that of a "super," the remuneration is the same. But the community of the little village has done far better than was expected, for the fees for tickets have this year been much in excess of any former occasion. Over and above the ordinary number of performances no less than sixteen extra performances have been given, and the amount thus realized reached the large sum of £75,000, while an enormous trade has been done in photographs, wood carvings, rosaries and "holy" images. For picture post cards alone no less than £7,500 has been taken, and it is said that the wood carvers of Oberammergau have not a single article left "on stock." Thus it is plain to see that though the season in Switzerland and the Tyrol is said to have been a bad one the little Bavarian mountain village has reaped a golden harvest.—Westminster Gazette.

Chinese Wives Subordinate.

Many of the characters in the Chinese language are very suggestive of the relationship between husband and wif, and leave no doubt as to the subordinate position which the woman occupies in Chinese domestic life. The part which the Chinaman plays in securing his bride is vigorously illustrated in the word to seize, the character for woman crouching under the Chinese symbol for claws, while the character for wife, indicated by a woman placed beside a broom, is evidence of the Chinaman's opinion with regard to the proper position of his helpmate in his household.

A suspicious disposition and a fondness for talking is the combination which makes a gossip.

One thousand dollars was paid at a Kansas City stock sale for a Hereford bull calf.

The little town of Ivrea, in the Valle d'Aosta, Italy, is celebrating the twentieth century of its foundation. The little town sits in a beautiful nook on the southern side of the Alps and is much beloved of such tourists as discover it.

Mrs. Kabos, who lives near the Cayuga coal beaker on Ferdinand street, Scranton, Pa., was walking through her garden, when the earth gave way and dropped her forty feet into a mine. She was rescued in a short time, having sustained only trifling injuries.

According to General Baden-Powell, there is a future for girls in South Africa. The situation is realized by practical Germans, who have already started a regular emigration bureau for young women, most of whom are engaged or married almost as soon as they land.

The public stairway at the White House has at last yielded to the pressure of the constant trooping of visitors up and down it, and is now so weak that it needs repairs. Colonel Bingham is putting in more support for the second flight, which is suspended by a steel rod.

An express train speeding toward Williamsport, Pa., struck a huge bowlder while going fifty miles an hour about 2 o'clock in the morning. A slower or lighter train would probably have been wrecked, but as it was the bowlder was tossed from the track. It had been loosened by recent rains and had rolled onto the rails.

Facilities are rapidly being provided by the New Zealand educational department for the training of Maori children. There are now eighty-four Maori schools in the colony, and a number of scholarships are provided for Maori children to enable them to proceed to the higher schools or to undergo a course of technical training.

The Boston Athenaeum has long contained three busts which no one in that city was able to identify. The assistant librarian, a young woman, has just recognized them as excellent likenesses of Lewis Cass, the great statesman; Nicholas Biddle, one of the most eminent financiers of the century, and a Russian prince, famous all over the world.

A farmer in Southern Missouri recently received some garden seeds from the Department of Agriculture in an official envelope, on the outside of which was printed the usual warning: "Penalty for private use, $300." He immediately sent them back, with a letter to the effect that he had not used one of them and was not subject to any fine.

Neodesha, Kan., has a population of about 1,500, which includes more thin people than any place twice its size in America. Many men weigh less than 100 pounds, though in good health. Physicians say that the petroleum and natural gas wells there are responsible for making the people look like whitened refugees from a famine district in India.

Since 1897 Jay Jansen, agent in charge of a whaling station at Cape Haven, Baffin Land, has been alone at that isolated spot. The relief steamer Lily of the North, carrying a year's provisions for the lone watcher, was recently wrecked and now it will be impossible to reach him before next summer, by which time he probably will have died of starvation.

A peculiar incident was witnessed in the Bethany Presbyterian Church of Trenton, N. Y. The sermon had a soporific effect upon Harry Tidd, a young druggist, and he fell asleep. While still in slumber he arose, removed his coat, vest and collar and was about to further disrobe when the women in his vicinity screamed. An usher aroused him and led him out of the church.

Rest rooms for farmers' wives are being established in some towns in the West. They are located in the business center and are made cozy and comfortable with easy chairs, lounges, books and magazines. Some offer tea at the nominal price of 3 cents a cup. These rooms are sustained by women's clubs in the cities, or the merchants of the cities contribute to them, with the idea that they help to draw trade.

A group of apartment houses in Utica, N. Y., is provided throughout with electrical cooking utensils, consisting of three round platters, or "stoves," an oven and a broiler. When not needed they can be stowed away, leaving no outward trace of the use to which the room is put. The air is not vitiated and the apartment is kept much cooler. The same apartments are provided with electric curling tong heaters, which are much appreciated.

The plot of ground on which stands the historic monument erected at Tappan, N. Y., by the late Cyrus W. Field in memory of Andre, the revolutionary spy, has been sold for nonpayment of taxes. Since the death of Mr. Field the memorial has been neglected, and it has now passed into the hands of George Dickey, of Nyack, who says he will obliterate it. The monument was unveiled Oct. 2, 1879, and in April, 1882, attempts were made to destroy it by an explosion of nitroglycerin.

A Chicagoan just returned from a tour of the far West saw the following location notice on a mining claim in the Grand Encampment, Wyoming: "We found it and we claim it by the right of founding it. It's our'n. Its 750 feet in every direction except southwest and northeast, and there is 300 feet on each side of this writin'. It's called the Bay Horse, and we claim even the spurs, and we don't want nobody jumping on this Bay Horse—that's what's these trees is around here for and we've got the same piece of rope that we had down in old Missouri."

Unique among woman's clubs, perhaps, is that which was launched five years ago in Honolulu and is now reported to be at last on a firm footing. It was started by an American school teacher, who was wont to invite young girls to her home once a week for informal conversation on some topic. The outgrowth was a full-fledged club of thirty-four members, most of them being Hawaiians, with a mixture, however, of Chinese and Portuguese. The president this year is a Chinese girl, who wears her quaint national costume when she fills the official chair.

QUEER THINGS IN CHINA.

Features of an Oriental City that Struck a Missionary as Peculiar.

Miss Louise Hodgkins, in a letter to Zion's Herald dated early in the present year, describes her arrival at the city of Chinkiang, on the bank of the Yangtse River. The primitive character of the city is not due entirely to its age, for it has been largely rebuilt since the Taiping rebellion, a date that in China corresponds to our "before the war." With a chance to begin afresh, the inhabitants only crowded closer to the shore, leaving the hills to the fort, the barracks and the various missions.

It was 10 o'clock at night when the writer reached this Chinese city. A bright starlight enabled her to follow a friend through the Concession, along the unpaved streets, and up to the heights beyond.

"What are these curious haystack mounds?" was the newcomer's first question, as she picked her way among strange hillocks.

"Oh, these are the graves," was the reply. "Didn't you know we lived in the very middle of a graveyard?"

There were hundreds of them, each surmounted by a cap of fresh sod of the size and shape of an inverted milk pan. This sod is the new cap provided annually for the traveler journeying to the undiscovered country. Miss Hodgkins did not chance, as often happens, to stumble over a coffin left uninterred until the family Solon should declare that the propitious moment for burial had arrived.

"And what are these?" was her question a few minutes later, as by the light of a coolie's lantern she and her friend stumbled among graves and mud-puddles, and came suddenly upon what looked like the top of the traditional prairie-schooner, save that it was a trifle broader and was thatched.

"These are the huts of the very poor," was the answer; and huts they were. Windowless, doorless—except for an entrance hole—fireless, floorless, they were all the shelter the occupants had through winters as severe as those of New England. The deep breathing within and the occasional bark of a dog gave constant token that the travelers were passing through a thickly settled neighborhood.

Next morning, under the sunlight, the graves looked numberless, but they were seen to blossom with violets and dandelions. Far below, too far for its squalor and wretchedness to be seen, stretched the city, while under the windows of the house was the parade ground.

Breathlessly the newcomer inquired what the soldiers at drill were doing with the long fishing rods, with which they appeared to be running violently at each other, uttering wild Indian yells.

It was explained that this was an ancient form of onslaught come down from the days of Confucius at the latest. Its object is to trip up the antagonist with the long stick, throw water in his face, and in the midst of his bewilderment at this extraordinary treatment to cut off his head.

The writer found it hard to believe her eyes and ears. And all this was after the recent Chino-Japanese war, when the Chinese found out to their humiliation, but evidently not to their enlightenment, what the enemy would do while they were shaking sticks and fans at them.

Made Himself Understood.

When Henry S. Watson, the illustrator, landed at Naples, he did not know much about European travel. He had to make some sketches in the villages about Naples and his experiences have filled him with wonder enough for a lifetime. His deft pencil helped him a bit. At one little village inn he tried to get it through the landlord's head that he was to be called early in the morning. He couldn't make himself understood. At last he drew a picture of himself lying in bed, the sun peeping through the window, the clock at the hour of 6 and the chambermaid knocking at the door. Then it was quite plain and they woke him on the tick.—Philadelphia Post.

He Objected.

He—I don't like the idea of using so much secular music in our church. Did you notice the selection the organist played last Sunday?

She—No. What was it?

He—I don't know the name of it, but it is something I have frequently heard at sacred concerts.—Harlem Life.

Egyptian Jewel Saws and Drills.

There is good evidence, says Engineering, that the ancient Egyptians used reciprocating saws and hollow drills set with jewels, and that they worked them under great pressure to get coarse cuts.

Oxen Take to Poison.

To the South African oxen the tulip plant, which the beasts greedily devour if they can get it, is rank poison.

LABOR WORLD

Galveston's export trade amounts to nearly $40,000,000 a year.

Minneapolis, Minn., boasts of a dressmakers' union with a large membership.

In Germany 544,283 children under 14 years of age are employed in various industries.

The government of Norway has decided to introduce the eight-hour day in all public institutions.

The bona fide membership of the American Society of Engineers on Sept. 1, 1900, was 86,517, a gain during the last month of 431.

Every day the dispatch works of Glasgow dispose of 1,370 tons of garbage; 1,300 men and 300 horses are employed by the cleaning department.

Reports to the bureau of labor statistics of New York for the last quarter show that active organization work continues and that a gain of 15,000, embracing 151 unions, was made to the membership of labor bodies for that period. New York now has 1,603 labor organizations, with an aggregate membership of 247,602.

The prices obtained for the labor power of convicts in Georgia penal institutions last year varied from $98 to $102 per head. Out of this amount the State feeds and clothes the prisoners, furnishing healthy men for those whose energies are exhausted. Ninety per cent of the coal, brick and lumber industries of Georgia is controlled by contractors of convict labor.

Since 1862 there have been only twenty-one strikes in France in the building trades. In all the cities of France the employers of the various branches of the building trades are organized into what are called syndicates, and the trade syndicate in turn sends delegates to a central building trades' syndicate. The same plan of organization is adopted by the workingmen.

American machinery will hereafter handle the coal and iron received and shipped in the harbor of Alexandria, Egypt, with a reduction in the cost per ton from $1.50 to 50 cents or less. An expert was sent to this country to study the problem, and the result is the construction of an elevated tramway on the American plan. American bridges and locomotives had been previously introduced in the land of the Pharaohs.

The largest order for equipment ever placed was taken by the Pressed Steel Car Company of Chicago and Pittsburg. The order embraces the manufacture of some 6,000 steel cars of 100,000 pounds capacity for an Eastern trunk line. More than 100,000 tons of steel will be required in making the cars, or twice the weight of the great Tay bridge structure. Work will be furnished to about 5,000 men for six months at the three plants of the company. The bill for this contract is reported to exceed $6,000,000. Night and day turns will be run until the contract is filled.

LAW AS INTERPRETED.

Indictments found by the Grand Jury on a holiday are held, in State vs. Thomas (Ohio), 48 L. R. A. 459, not to be for that reason invalid.

Persons undertaking to cross a bridge with a heavy traction engine and water tank are held in Board of Commissioners vs. Coffman (Ohio), 48 L. R. A. 455, to do so at their own risk, if they do not make a sufficient examination of the bridge and if they put upon it a load that is extraordinary.

One who bids at a public sale, not because of any desire to purchase, but merely to run up the price, either in his own interest or that of another, is held, in McMillin vs. Harris (Ga.), 48 L. R. A. 345, not to be a "puffer," if in case his bid is the last and highest he can be compelled to take and pay for the property, although by arrangement with others he may not be compelled to keep and pay for it.

Sentence of conviction imposed under a statute after reversal of a former judgment imposed under a statute that was unconstitutional because retroactive, is held, in Commonwealth vs. Murphy (Mass.), 48 L. R. A. 393, not to violate a constitutional provision against double jeopardy or other constitutional guaranties, although the convict had partly served the invalid sentence before it was reversed, including one day's solitary confinement, to which each sentence condemned him.

Thumb-Nail Ornithology.

People who have their will of the birds with camera and opera-glass—whether they tell of it afterward in book or lecture, or keep it for their own gloating—can yet appreciate the point of view of a more limited vision.

At a village meeting in Scotland, presumably for the intellectual betterment of the villagers, the lecturer proposed to read a paper about rooks.

"What can he have to say aboot the craw?" remarked an old farmer. "It's juist a bird that eats taties."

Lobsters.

Hubby—I feel like the deuce this morning. I'm afraid those lobsters I ate last night didn't agree with me.

Wifey—I was afraid they wouldn't. They were green when I bought them, and I told the fish man I didn't think they were ripe, and he said they always come that way.—Harper's Bazar.

A NIGHT OF MISERY.

RIDING IN A LOCKED BOX CAR WITH TWO SCARED MULES.

An Experience Which, According to the Victim, Made Sherman's Definition of War Seem Like the Description of a Sunday School Picnic.

"Well," said the Footprint to Slug Seven as he settled down on his stool and began to throw in a handful of type, "if I didn't have a time of it getting down here out of those mountains."

"Been up in the mines?" inquired Slug Seven.

"Yep," replied the Footprint. "Just came out. Footed it from Angels to Milton yesterday and rode into Stockton on a side door sleeper last night. A side door sleeper," continued the Footprint, "is not the most comfortable mode of traveling. Personally I prefer to ride on a red cushion, but the heartless and exorbitant demand of the railroad trust for spot cash compelled me to walk or come as freight. I came as freight."

"Sure," said Slug Seven.

"The unpleasant feature of the trip," continued the Footprint, "was the base betrayal of confidence on the part of the brakeman with whom I negotiated for an undisturbed passage. For a cash consideration of six bits and a drink of liquor he verbally contracted to waybill me from Milton to the division end at Stockton. We went up street to take the drink and—well, you know how one word brings on another. By train time the $4 I had sunk in my jeans had been fished to the surface and sent across the bar for red liquor.

"The brakeman was full when he started for the yards. So was I when I started after him. The brakeman confided to me on the way through the yards that he owned the whole train and I could ride anywhere and any way I wanted to. I told him that I was surrounding at least a quart of Milton whisky and if it was all the same to him and he had a nice, dry, empty box car I would be shipped as an unbroken original package. He agreed, and we went over where the train was standing made up to find that empty. The brakeman ran a door open, gave me a hurried boost in and ran the door shut and locked it. After a bit I struck a match to look about and what do you suppose that cuss had done?"

"Give it up," said Slug Seven.

"Billed me as live stock, by gum! Fact! There I was locked in a box with two mules, both loose, and all of us good to keep company to the division end. What was that Sherman said about war? Said it was hades, didn't he? Well, it ain't. It's only an imitation. The real, orthodox, rose colored hades is to spend a night in a locked box car with two mountain ranch mules.

"It isn't a long run from Milton in, and I concluded, after the train had bumped along about three miles and those scared mules had begun to charge around and kick a rat-a-tat-tat-tat on the sides of the car, that the only plan of campaign left to me was a flank movement and a sudden mounting of one of the animals. It wouldn't be a dream of pleasure on that mule's back, but it would be safer than dodging four rapid fire hind heels unlimbered for action. I got on the mule all right, and after a little bucking he steadied down tolerably well. The animal was evidently scared to death and seemed to take comfort in being straddled by a rider.

"Well, I was just chuckling to myself over the state of affairs in the live stock department of the Espee railway and figuring that another hour would see us in the division yards, where my friend the brakeman would open the door, when the train stopped, evidently at a siding, as I knew we weren't near a station. We bumped about a bit and I took a double wrap in the mule's ears; then we stood still while some other cars were bumped about and then I heard two short toots of the whistle and a rumble that gradually grew fainter. The train had pulled out and we were side tracked.!

"We staid there till morning, too, and I rode that son of a jackass, with a backbone like the ridge of a church roof, up and down and around that car every weary minute of all that weary night. To quit riding meant to go to sleep, fall off and have the liver and high lights and half tones trampled and kicked out of me by two scared mountain mules.

"I estimate that I rode that mule 136 miles and three furlongs in that car, and the car traveled 17 miles before being side tracked. The remaining three miles of the 20 between Milton and Stockton I made on foot, thus completing a journey of 156 miles 3 furlongs in a straight line between two given points that are but 20 miles apart, a mathematically impossible feat, accomplished by one jackass with the aid of two relatives on the male side of the house."

The Footprint sighed as he paused to bite off a chew of tobacco, and Slug Seven took advantage of the opening to remark that a man who had traveled so far under such circumstances must be dry.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

An Inference.

"Such are the delusions to which the human senses and understanding are susceptible," remarked the man who doesn't care whether you comprehend him or not, "that, logically speaking, it is absolutely impossible to be absolutely sure of anything."

"Dear me!" exclaimed Miss Cayenne. "I didn't know you were one."

"What?"

"A weather prophet."—Washington Star.

The Difference.

"Pa, what's the difference between talent and genius?"

"A man with talent is able to build for himself the finest monument in the country. The public usually has to provide the monument for a genius."—Boston Journal.

It Was the Right Letter.

John was a bashful lover and had been calling on Mary for three years, but that was as far as he got until, visiting St. Louis on business, he found himself detained beyond the expected time.

He had to write to Mary, explaining his absence on the usual evening, and, while writing, the courage he had so long lacked came to him and he made a point blank proposal of marriage. He mailed the letter, and for two hours was one of the happiest men in Missouri.

Then he began to believe he had been precipitate and was assailed with doubt as to how his letter would be received. That night he didn't sleep. He thought all sorts of things, and vainly wished he could intercept the letter before it reached her. But that was manifestly impossible.

It was not until noon the next day that he received an inspiration as he was passing a telegraph office. Rushing in, he seized a blank and nervously penned the following:

Miss Mary ——, Chicago:

Mailed you wrong letter yesterday. Please do not open, and deliver to me on my return.

After that he breathed freer, at the same time wondering if he hadn't played the fool in not letting the matter stand. That evening a telegram was awaiting him at the hotel. It read:

John ——, St. Louis:

No; you mailed right letter. It was about time.

And John didn't allow business to interfere with his return to Chicago.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

One of the many camera fiends of this city has recently been showing his friends a very unusual photograph of himself, caught in the act of falling from a ladder, and seeming to be a winning candidate for a broken neck. In spite of the fact that the injury seems so certain the tumbler's face wears a cheery smile, and on close inspection may be seen to be winking his eye mischievously at you as well as the force of gravity. In reply to questions he explained that that was an accomplishment acquired only after long practice.

"I could pose for that picture all day long with no serious injury to myself, except waste of time and a little physical fatigue," he insisted. But the less credulous of his friends refused to believe that he took pleasure in such acrobatic performances, and finally he had to tell the whole story.

"It's all very simple. First you place your camera in some way about 10 or 12 feet from the floor, with the lens pointing downward. A picture taken with it in this position will make the floor appear to be a side wall. Lay a sheet of white cloth on the floor and then arrange your ladder and yourself upon this sheet, and the posing is done. A strip of carpet tacked to the wall and a couple of chairs deftly arranged adds to the illusion, but the whole thing is so simple that I am ashamed of myself for explaining it to you instead of making you think it out for yourself."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

About an Even Thing.

A well known member of the Detroit bar tells this story: "Some years ago I attended a session of the circuit court up in the state. A pro confesso divorce case was called and it so happened that the judge was very much opposed to divorces, especially those which were unopposed. After the attorney for the complainant in this case had announced himself as ready to proceed, the judge asked if any one appeared for the defendant. There was silence for a moment, and the judge repeated the question. At one end of the lawyers' table sat an attorney who had acquired the liquor habit and who was at the time considerably under the influence of stimulants. He was noticed struggling to get on his feet, and, on observing him, the judge seized the opportunity to ask:

"'Do you appear for the defendant, Mr. Blank?'

"'No, your honor. I merely rose to remark, as "friend of the court," that with Brother Doubleblank as attorney for the complainant and no one on the other side it was about an even thing.'

"Then Blank resumed his seat while the whole court roared with laughter."—Detroit Free Press.

The Foot of a Horse.

The foot of a horse is one of the most ingenious and unexampled pieces of mechanism in animal structure. The hoof contains a series of vertical and thin laminæ of horn, amounting to about 500 and forming a complete lining to it. In this are fitted as many laminæ belonging to the coffin bone, while both sets are elastic and adherent. The edge of a quire of paper, inserted leaf by leaf into another, will convey a sufficient idea of the arrangement. Thus the weight of the animal is supported by as many elastic springs as there are laminæ in all the feet, amounting to about 4,000, distributed in the most secure manner, since every spring is acted on in an oblique direction.

Billville's Postmaster.

Our new postmaster ran so fast for office that he didn't have time to get educated. The following sign is posted on the postoffice window:

"Thar is 2 Lettairs inside for Molly Gibbens. They look like they're from her son, Bill, who is Bin Mustard Out. Allsore 2 Lettairs for Hise Holman (I mean, One-legged Hise) which looks like they're From the Widder Stevens, as Her Ritin is knowed by Everybody. Call an git 'em—Hise an Molly."—Atlanta Constitution.

Martyrdom.

Mrs. Feeley—Mrs. Love must have been devotedly attached to her husband.

Mrs. Steele—Her grief amounts to insanity. She has a small fortune in diamonds, and she has been in mourning nearly two years.—Jewelers' Weekly.

How to Handle a Queen Bee.

Great care should be used in handling queens not to injure their abdomen or legs. When it is desired to catch a queen pick her up by the wings or grasp her gently by the thorax with the thumb and forefinger; there need be no fear of her stinging, for, while nature has provided her with a sting, she seldom, if ever, uses it except upon a rival queen. Do not attempt to catch or handle queens when at all nervous or excited, as you will be very apt to maim or injure them in some way, advises a writer in American Gardening.

JOHN J. MCLEAN,
Observer.

*Record beginning March 6th 1898.

See land and probate notices this issue.

Ernest Laird left for Bakersfield last week.

S. A. Fraser has moved into the Brady house, and is renovating the same.

Harry C. Ober and Mrs. M. E. McGranahan were married at Hawthorne January 17th.

Dr. Woodin is out, with ankle in boiler plates. He is an exemplar of nerve for his patients.

During the week a small band of horses started out from here destined for Oklahoma Territory.

Superior Judge Lamar left by last Saturday's train for San Jose, whence he will return on the 8th prox.

J. W. Kelly, the Mono-Inyo mining man, is a member of the Kern County Board of Supervisors from Randsburg.

Orcier Bros. of Big Pine passed through Independence on Wednesday, en route to Bakersfield to inspect the oil fields.

Chas. Houle reports four feet of snow over on the eastern side of the Inyos, in Beveridge district. The deserts will bloom this year.

T. C. Boland has removed the Keeler concentrating plant up to Cerro Gordo, where it will be located near the site of the old Beaudry furnace.

Supt. J. J. Gunn of the Minneatta left on Tuesday for the mines, accompanied by his wife, who met him here on her return from San Francisco.

T. F. A. Connelly, from Bishop, and a walking cyclopedia of the earliest history of this region, was a guest at the Norman House during the week.

O. I. Mairs, Thos. Webb and Frank Whitmore are among those who are off to San Francisco with the several train loads of cattle shipped from Sanger's.

A letter just received from Wm. R. Johnson states that he read in the Inyo papers that he was ill with the pneumonia. Bill says it was all news to him. Inyo friends are glad that such is the case.

Of the fifteen or twenty men who have withstood the winter rigors at Cerro Gordo, the veteran Chris. Crohn is about the only one on the sick list. Sorry to say that he is badly afflicted with the rheumatism.

County financial reports for the last quarterly term are given this week. The Treasurer's report indicates an extraordinary volume of business, the increase, however, being mostly on account of transactions for the State.

David Holland was in Independence on Monday last, on business intent. He is just from Bakersfield and has been personally inspecting other oil-fields—at Los Angeles and in San Diego county as far out as the Colorado desert.

W. M. Richards, whilom of the C. & C. office at Keeler, is now with the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Co., at San Francisco, and is general agent of the Juanita Oil Co., with lands in San Diego, Riverside and San Bernardino counties.

Fred. B. Parker, the prospector, and Harry Floyd, a collector of Indian curio, started out on a trip eastward last evening. They cross the Inyos by the trail from Keeler and expect to wind around the Ubehebe mountains and return by the Big Pine pass.

Looks like Tonapah is to be the central point for the customary Spring mining excitement and rush. Specimens of the ore which have been examined by this scribe are of the variety that made people wild over White Pine. They have about as much weight of horn-silver as rock.

Under the new order of things at the Defiance mine in Darwin a grade is being made for a dry concentrating plant, after an experimental test of five tons of the ore at San Francisco. The Defiance and and Independence mines together form one of the most extensively exploited silver-lead properties in California, and expose enormous quantities of low grade ore. Under modern processes old mines become new bonanzas.

Several proper personal "mentions" were necessarily omitted last week, one of which was the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Irv. H. Mulholland and boy; Chas. Walter and Charles Mulholland. With a well-equipped train and band of horses there is no doubt of their reaching in safety the objective point, which is on White River, Tulare county. All will probably return home sometime during the Spring.

Sunday School, 2:30 p. m.

Preaching, 7 p. m. Subject: How shall we think of God?

The following home items are obtained from the Randsburg Miner:

Dave Congdon, foreman of the Oh Be Joyful mine in Tuba Canyon reports taking out good ore from that property. Nels Hoff and another man now have a contract to cut and haul wood, as they have had some trouble to get fuel enough to keep going.

Tom Walker and Dean Harris have taken a contract to run a 400 foot tunnel on the Cooper mine above the stone corral in Pleasant Canyon in the Panamint mountains. This is a rich little mine, some of the finest specimens coming out of it we have ever seen.

At Cerro Gordo E. R. Hamilton has resumed mining operations, involving a 300-foot tunnel to tap the Boushey ledge at a depth of 250 feet. Other important things are beginning on the hill. After a years' wandering to Mexico and Cape Nome the Troeger Brothers have returned to the old camp and resumed work on the Beauregard and Morning Star mines. To avoid hoisting expense a tunnel will be run to open the ledge nearly 1000 feet deep, for which the ground is well adapted and it will, of course, save that much of a climb up the mountain.

On Monday last the remains of George Rose were laid away in the Odd Fellows' Cemetery. Rev. Bigelow kindly officiated and friends here did all they could to show real sympathy. The young man contracted pneumonia, and before his residence at Fish Springs could be reached by Dr. Dorrance, of Bishop, it was too late for professional skill to avail. The surviving brothers and sister of the deceased have had, during the two years just passed, more than their share of mortuary trouble.

Pat. Clinton is registered at the Independence Hotel. He has been steadily at work on the Newtown mine at Cerro Gordo, driving the 500-foot tunnel, which is now within 10 or 12 feet of the ledge. Mr. Clinton is great on tunnels, and in all these years has averaged up well as any miner in the country.

The several school district funds have been replenished by the following apportionment of State money--$4,758 55:

Bishop.....	$942 68	Big Pine.....	$812 19

The one billionth minute since the beginning of our present system of chronology will be reached at 10:40 a. m. April 30, 1902. Anyone anywise dubious about it may verify by some figuring.

The Carson News says that a contract has been let to build an arena in Carson in which to hold prize fights. It will have a capacity for 10,000, and will be a permanent and handsome structure.

The effect of the death of the grand old Queen of England upon panic-stricken politics of Europe cannot be estimated. The "mother country" of North America is in a bad way.

W. A. Clark was chosen United State Senator by the Montana Legislature last week, and Matthew Quay was elected from Pennsylvania.

Women

Who have the Blues

Despondency in women is a mental condition directly traceable to some distinctly female ill. Well women don't have the blues, but comparatively few people understand that the right medicine will drive them away.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

overcomes the blues, because it is the safeguard of woman's health.

It regulates the entire female organism as nothing else does. When the dragging sensation and the backache go, the blues will go also.

Read the letters from women appearing in this paper—women who have tried it and know. There are a million such women.

The young Swedish explorer Sven Hedin, whose adventures and researches on "the roof of the world" have made him renowned, wrote for The Youth's Companion before starting on his present expedition a vivid descripiton of a journey through the wilds of Mongolia. This is among the many features of interest announced for publication in the next volume.

Once, after exposing the ridiculous blunders of the editor of certain old plays, James Russell Lowell concluded with the remark, "In point of fact, we must apply to this gentleman the name of the first King of Sparta." No one remembered, of course, what this was, but when they looked it up they found it was Eudamidas.

As Horace Mann sat in his study one evening, an insane man rushed into the room, and, after abusing him for all kinds of fancied grievances, challenged him to a fight. Mr. Mann replied: "My dear fellow, it would give me a great pleasure to accommodate, but I can't do it, the odds are so unfair. I am a Mann by name and a man by nature—two against one! It would never do to fight." The insane man answered: "Come ahead; I am a man, and a man beside myself; let us four have a fight."

Prince Bismarck and Bancroft, the historian, at one time minister to the court of Berlin, were one day dining with Herr von der Heydt, who prided himself on the quantity and quality of the food which he furnished to his guests. In those days (1868) Bismarck was still in possession of his wonderful appetite. Bancroft, at first amazed, became at last anxious on seeing his friend twice partake largely of the first courses. "Dear Count," he remarked with a world of anxiety in his voice, "I believe there is more to come." "I should hope so," replied Bismarck, joyfully; and renewed his terrifying practice at the next course.

It was once usual for Highland shepherds to take their dogs into church and leave them outside the pews. Two shepherds at enmity sat on opposite sides of the aisle one Sunday, and, soon after the sermon began, the dogs—one a collie and the other not—seemed to enter into their master's quarrel. The shepherds' egged on their dogs in undertones, and soon there was a real fight in progress. Most of those in the immediate neighborhood craned their necks over the pews to see how the encounter was coming out, and not a few were standing up. The minister's patience was ultimately exhausted, and so he called to his "hearers" and said: "Ah, weel, my britherin, I see ye are more interested in the dog-fight than in my sermon, and so I'll close the bulke—and I'll bet half a crown on the collie!"

Capt. Hans Miron, who lost his life at his post of duty on the burning Saale at Hoboken, a few months ago, was fond of telling of his early introduction to the stern realities of his chosen career. He had but just come on board the schooner where, as cabin-boy, he was to serve his apprenticeship to the sea, and was still staring about him with boyish interest and inquisitiveness, when the skipper approached and ordered him to assist in washing down the deck. He put down his bundle and started awkwardly to do so, when a second order, acompanied by emphatic expletives, was given him to take off his shoes and stockings. He was perfectly willing to oblige, but at home he had not been permitted to wet his feet. "No," he answered innocently, with an engaging smile, "I should not mind, but my mother does not allow it." The skipper was a rough old sea-dog, who did not appreciate obedience unless it was rendered to himself, and his reply was a stunning blow that flung the boy across the deck. "But after that," Capt. Miron would say, with a great laugh and not a shadow of resentment, "I knew who was captain of that schooner, and it was not my mother."

TUNING A PIPE ORGAN.

It Takes Two or Three Days and Is a Nerve-Trying Job.

"The misuse which many pipe organs suffer is a wonder to me," said a veteran organ tuner and builder. "Church organs cost from $1,000 to $10,000. They are very sensitive to changes of temperature and yet many are heated and chilled once a week all winter and allowed to get damp soaked in summer. The same people who neglect an organ will take good care of a piano costing a tenth or twentieth as much.

"An organ is a good deal like a human being when it comes to changes of the thermometer. Sudden drops put a man out of tune and it's the same with the instrument. It needs an even, moderate temperature during the winter instead of a roasting on Sunday and a freeze the rest of the week. In summer a stone or brick church gets damp. A slight fire once a week will keep the organ dry.

"A pipe organ requires tuning at least once a year and the best instruments are looked over two or three times in that period. It is a two or three days' job and needs two men. Besides the tuner up in the organ an assistant must be at the key board to hold down the keys. Temperature has to be considered even in tuning. All the pipes must be brought to pitch at about the same degree, and this degree should be that which the organ usually has when in use.

"I believe that pipe organ tuning is the most nervous work one can tackle. In fact, after long experience I have come to believe that I tune with my nerves. No, I don't refer to the nerves of hearing. I get my impressions that way, but I tune with my nervous system. My assistant strikes the chord. If it is not true I feel a nervous stress and strain. As soon as the chord is true my nerves become harmonious, too. It sounds funny, but it's so.

"Two or three days may seem like a long time to take to tune an organ, but when you stop to think of the 1,700 pipes in a large modern instrument, it isn't so long. A large organ will have a compass of five octaves or sixty-one keys. These instruments have twenty-eight registers and a pipe to each key and register brings the number to 1,708. Not every key and register has a pipe, but as some have two it amounts to that. The pipes are of all sorts and sizes, most of them wood, but many of metal. A small number of the large and long wooden pipes never get out of tune. They are too long. For many years the fancy pipes at the front of an organ were only ornamental, but nowadays these sound as well.

"I find that pipe tuning is a mystery to most people. They can understand how the piano strings are tightened and loosened. But changes in the pitch of pipes queer them. It isn't strange either, for the average organ has five kinds of tuning. Of course, the pitch depends on the length of the pipe. The pitch may be raised by shortening the pipe or by stopping the open end. A number of the wooden pipes are stopped by wooden slides. Handles are attached and the pipe is tuned by moving the slides up or down. Other woods have set in the top a piece of metal which is rolled or bent over partially to stop the pipe.

"Ribbon strips are cut in the sides of the tall metal pipes and rolled down. These break the column of air and act the same as cutting off the top of the pipe. Another kind of pipes, the reeds, are on a different principle. The length of the reed controls the pitch. A wire presses tightly against the reed and is moved to lengthen or shorten the vibrating length."—New York Sun.

WAS PEACHES AND CREAM.

General Starr Always Glad to Meet Young West-Pointers.

A gallant old American soldier who at one time was well known in Kansas had many idiosyncrasies, not the least of which was an irrepressible dislike for young lieutenants when first sent out from West Point. The name of this old soldier was General Starr, and at the time of which we write he was a major in the Sixth United States Cavalry, though during the civil war he had been a brigadier general.

In 1874 General Starr was in command at Fort Riley, and one day an orderly came to his quarters with the message that Lieutenant Morrison, just from West Point, was at the post ready to pay his respects and report for duty. In response to this message the old general was starting for his office, when his wife, a motherly old soul, plucked him by the sleeve and said: "Now, general, promise me that you won't be rough with that young man."

"Rough?" said the old man, smiling amiably upon his matrimonial companion. "Why I'll be peaches and cream unless the young dog riles me.'

Reaching his office the general was confronted with a dapper little fellow, as spick and span as though he had just come from the hands of his barber and tailor, while he had the half-supercilious air that seems inseparable from the first stages of military education.

Looking the young lieutenant over for half a moment the old general said with great dignity: "How do you do, Mr. Morrison? I am pleased to see you." Then, as a flush gradually mounted over his weather-beaten features, he added: "I am always glad to see you young men from the military academy. You—you—(here the general ended with a roar)—you think yourselves so —— smart!"—Kansas City Journal.

GERMAN MASK INDUSTRY.

How Paper and Gauze Masks Are Made and What They Cost.

Paper masks are made by doubling one sheet of a specially prepared paper, wetting it, and molding it by hand over a face form; it is then dried by artificial heat and cut off to form, according to the Consular Reports. Openings are cut for eyes, nose and mouth, and it is painted and decorated by hand as desired. The paper used by Sonneberg manufacturers is made in Oeslau and Schleusingen and costs at present about 1.40 marks (33 cents) per 480 sheets. One sheet makes three of the common masks. The painting of cheap masks costs about 50 pfennigs (12 cents) per gross; the molding of face costs about 60 pfennigs (14 cents) per gross. Packing is figured at about 3 per cent, as the masks are rolled in brown paper, the ends being folded in to save string. The expenses are estimated at about 15 per cent, leaving the net profit 20 to 22 per cent, as the complete article sells at present at about 1.80 marks (42.8 cents) per gross.

Wire masks are made by stamping a piece of wire netting about one foot square over a face mold in a large machine, inclosing the rough wire edges in a narrow strip of lead and painting. The latter is done by hand in oil colors.

Gauze masks are made by molding over a clay face form a doubled piece of cheap linen gauze that has previously been soaked in a starchy paste. The sticky linen is made to adhere to the form, and this is set on a stove and dried for about twenty minutes. The linen is then taken off and openings cut for the eyes, mouth and nostrils. It is painted as desired, and makes one of the most practical masks known. The gauze mask is used considerably in the United States, but the larger portion of them are made therein by machines owned by two firms, one in New York and the other in Findlay, Ohio.

Terrible Fall.

This is said to be one of the diversions occasionally indulged in at Kansas City:

Solemn-faced man (with newspaper)—Well, I see there was a singular accident at one of the slaughter-houses out at the stock yards yesterday. A man who was leaning out of an upper story window let go and dropped sixty feet, and wasn't hurt a particle.

Eager Listener—How did that happen?"

Solemn-faced Man—They were pigs' feet.

His Dim Idea.

A teacher was giving to her class an exercise in spelling and defining words.

"Thomas," she said to a curly-haired little boy, "spell 'ibex.'"

"I-b-e-x."

"Correct. Define it."

"An ibex," answered Thomas, after a prolonged mental struggle, "is where you look in the back part of the book when you want to find anything that's printed in the front part of the book."

Narrow Escape.

THEY SLEEP HANGING UP.

Sloths and Bats Suspend Themselves Without Exertion.

There is one animal which lives entirely in trees, but is able to maintain its position during slumber without the least exercise of muscular force. This is the sloth, common in the forests of tropical America. Its long claws are so bent that they hook over the branches and allow the creature to hang upside down like an animated hammock. Curiously enough, the hammock appears to be a South American invention and is universally employed by all the Indian tribes of the Amazons. Perhaps the primitive human dwellers in this region took to sleeping in hammocks after observing the habits of the sloth.

The great ant eater, which is both a kinsman and fellow countryman of the sloth, has an enormous tail, which it uses in a very remarkable manner. I recently saw two of these strange animals lying together asleep, and they had arranged their tails so cleverly that their whole bodies were hidden from view. Moreover, it was evident that this caudal covering would afford excellent protection from the weather, for the central solid part of the tails acted as a kind of ridge pole over the highest part of the sleepers' bodies, so that the long fringes of hair sloped downward on each side like the thatch upon a roof.

Like the sloths, many kinds of bats sleep suspended by their hooked claws without any muscular exertion whatever. Some of the large fruit eating bats of the tropics, which do this sleep in holes like the species common in southern latitudes, but which hang suspended to the branches of trees in the open air, adopt a position which it would be difficult to beat for economy and comfort. Gould's fruit eating bat, common in the warmer parts of Australia, suspends itself upside down by one hind foot and wraps its body in the tentlike folds of its wing membranes, which extend right down to the ankles. Its shoulders, to which the membrane is attached, are humped up so as to act as eaves to shoot off the rain, and when asleep it draws its head under their shelter and nestles its nose among the warm fur of its chest.

SAVED BY PALMISTRY.

Tattered Individual Proves His Case by Showing His Hands.

"Reasoning from antecedent probability," said the justice to a prisoner with a soppy hat and a turned down mouth, "I would say that when this policeman accuses you of being a tramp he is speaking with a high regard for the truth."

"Knowing little about logic," the defendant replied, "I am unable to say whether I am guilty on that proof. But by palmistry I am innocent. My life line is good, my capacity for hard work is simply astonishing, and my confidence in my own ability is superb."

"Score one for palmistry. Now hold up your hands."

They went up.

"I can't tell whether you have worked by the looks of those hands," said the justice. "But in the interest of the spread of knowledge I will digress and say to you that an article known as soap was invented some years ago."

"Never heard of it," said the prisoner cheerfully, "and I know just as much about my guilt or innocence as I do about soap. You might try me by a jury of my peers."

"Your peers are too busy telling fairy tales to bartenders on this muggy morning to come out to help the ends of justice. The dollar they'd get for jury service would make them die of heart disease."

"A doctor told me I'd never have that," the prisoner said.

"I'm not intensely interested in the state of your health," the justice said coldly. "I don't know whether you're a tramp, and neither do you. I am inclined to the opinion that you are, but I guess no policeman will arrest you between here and the corner."

The prisoner made the trial trip successfully and was seen no more.—Chicago Journal.

"Low Neck Dinners,"

A few days ago a lady in pursuit of a cook was interviewing and being interviewed at a certain employment bureau. "I shall want you to go into the country with me," she remarked to the mighty personage, who was eying her from head to foot. "Yez, mam; and do yez have low neck dinners, mam?" Mrs. Cook inquired. "'Low neck dinners!' What do you mean by that?" said the lady. "Well, mam, do yez eat yez dinner in low neck dresses? I hev a fri'nd who says she'll not take no place unless the family eats in low necks, an I thought I wouldn't either." So this is what we are all coming to! Not even our domestics will endure "plain living," and if one wants a $6 cook she can't have her without promising to "eat in low necks."—Boston Herald.

The Dog's Watchfulness.

The dog's watchfulness, so much and so thoughtlessly lauded as the expression of his devotion to man, is merely the instinctive watchfulness necessary to his safety in a wild state and is a characteristic which he would exercise quite as readily for his own kind and the preservation of his lair as he would for the benefit of man. When he barks at strange dogs or gives warning at night of the approach of strangers, it should not be overlooked that he considers his own home is disturbed, though it may be the home of his master. Much depends on the point of view.—B. Waters in Forest and Stream.

Doors in China.

In China doors are often round, leaf shaped or semicircular. In placing them the builder usually avoids having one opposite another lest evil spirits find their way from the street into the recesses of the building. The doorways separating the courts of a garden are usually of an elaborate kind, and the octagonal form is one of the most popular.

Religious superstition asserts itself in Chinese architecture, and the universal sacredness of the numerals three and nine is shown in the arrangement of temple doors. There is a triple gateway to each of the halls of the imperial palace, and the same order prevails at the Ming tombs, and the sacred person of the emperor when he was in his Peking home could only be approached even by the highest officials after three times three prostrations. The Temple of Heaven has a triple roof, a triple marble staircase, and all its mystic symbolism points either to three or its multiples.

Life Insurance Contracts.

The business of life insurance having become so tremendous and the competition so great, it seems as though in the rush for business that the real character and meaning of the policy contracts which are being issued by the various companies are not always understood, and that under the guise of the so-called five, ten or twenty year "distribution" policies and the five, ten or twenty year "accumulation" policies many of the leading companies are doing everything possible to avoid allowing annual dividends. The dividends thus withheld for long periods of years, ostensibly for the benefit of persistent survivors, are forfeited and confiscated by such "tontine" companies in case of either the death of the insured or lapse of his policy from nonpayment of premium at any time during the said five, ten or twenty year periods, and the withheld dividends are thus practically available for expenses. But there are still a few companies which are unalterably opposed to the aforesaid "lottery" or "tontine dividend" system, and which divide up their surplus annually among their members, notably among them stands the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Newark, N. J., which is, in fact, the leading annual dividend company of the country.

Regarding the dividend paying ability of the principal companies, the official reports of the business for the past 10 years show that, with over $950,000,000 less premium than the three largest "Tontine" companies, namely, the Mutual Life, the Equitable Life, and the New York Life combined, the Mutual Benefit, the leading "Annual Distribution" Company, has saved more than twice as much of its interest receipts from investments above expenses for policyholders, as all of said "Tontine" companies—the Mutual Benefit as shown below, having thus saved $14,572,936.

Scrofula

THE OFFSPRING OF HEREDITARY BLOOD TAINT.

Scrofula is but a modified form of Blood Poison and Consumption. The parent who is tainted by either will see in the child the same disease manifesting itself in the form of swollen glands of the neck and throat, catarrh, weak eyes, offensive sores and abscesses and oftentimes white swelling—sure signs of Scrofula. There may be no external signs for a long time, for the disease develops slowly in some cases, but the poison is in the blood and will break out at the first favorable opportunity. S. S. S. cures this wasting, destructive disease by first purifying and building up the blood and stimulating and invigorating the whole system.

J. M. Seals, 115 Public Square, Nashville, Tenn., says: "Ten years ago my daughter fell and cut her forehead. From this wound the glands on the side of her face became swollen and bursted. Some of the best doctors here and elsewhere attended her without any benefit. We decided to try S. S. S., and a few bottles cured her entirely."

SSS makes new and pure blood to nourish and strengthen the body, and is a positive and safe cure for Scrofula. It overcomes all forms of blood poison, whether inherited or acquired, and no remedy so thoroughly and effectively cleanses the blood. If you have any blood trouble, or your child has inherited some blood taint, take S. S. S. and get the blood in good condition and prevent the disease doing further damage.

TRIALS OF THE "NOTES AND QUERIES" MAN.

ELOPED IN A BALLOON.

TEXAN'S DARING WAY TO WIN A BRIDE.

Lovers Have Eloped on Horseback, Escaped Irate Fathers by Boat—They Have Also Used Railroad Trains, but in Mexico They Ballooned It.

Since the world began lovers have always ben equal to the task of uniting their destinies and fortunes in spite of opposing parents and guardians. They have eloped on horseback, escaped the vengeance of irate fathers by sailing across stormy waters, and they have used special railroad trains to put themselves beyond the reach of angry pursuing parties, but in Mexico for the first time a heroic young man and a brave girl used a balloon to elope. Randall Howard, a wealthy young man, whose home is in Marion County, Mo., went to Southern Texas about a year ago to get the benefit of the salubrious climate of the valley of the Rio Grande. He divided his time between Eagle Pass and Del Rio, frequently making excursions into old Mexico. He seemed to be well supplied with money, and being of a jolly, liberal disposition he soon became well known and popular with the best classes of people, both in Texas and Mexico. He was fond of hunting, and nothing pleased him better than to collect a crowd of young people and make a trip to the Santa Rosa Mountains, where game is abundant and the finest fish in the world are easily caught in the clear waters of the numerous beautiful streams. During one of these pleasure excursions young Howard made the acquaintance of Don Antonio Sanchez, a wealthy ranchman, and was invited to visit his hacienda. Howard accepted the invitation, and he was warmly welcomed by the old don's wife and beautiful daughter, who had just returned from a convent school in the City of Mexico.

Not many little walks had been taken through the orange groves of the old hacienda, where the frost never gleams and the flowers bloom forever, before the young Missourian became satisfied that the beautiful Spanish girl reciprocated his affection for her. He abandoned his Texas friends and moved his effects to the little village not far from Don Antonio's ranch. Howard had been warned by his sweetheart that her father's remarkable politeness and apparent warm friendship for his guest could not me relied upon to withstand the test of parting with his daughter. "He likes you very well, Senor Howard," the young girl would say, "but he is the son of one of the veterans that Santa Anna led into Texas, and it is hardly probable that he will ever permit me to marry an American." The ardent lover soon discovered that the young girl was well informed. One day when the old don was gradually falling into one of his most hospitable and affectionate moods over a bottle of wine the young man boldly approached the subject. The glass dropped from the old don's trembling hand and his eyes flashed with rage. The hilarious, amiable host of the previous moment was instantly transformed into a furious human tiger. "What!" he roared. "My daughter marry a Texas American? Never! Such audacity! I invite you to my hacienda and you take advantage of my hospitality to steal the affections of my innocent child." As Howard prudently began to rise to his feet, Don Antonio began to shout orders to his peons. To one he said: "Bring me my pistols;" to another, "Lock up my daughter," and to another, "Call the dogs." It suddenly occurred to the young Missourian that Texas was a nice country, and it did not take him long to find a trail that led towards a crossing on the Rio Grande.

After sending his sweetheart a letter by a faithful peon he set out for St. Louis, where he developed a plan to accomplish his purpose, which has succeeded after one of the most desperate and perilous adventures that two eloping lovers ever experienced. Mr. Howard secured the services of an accomplished aeronaut, and after purchasing a good balloon he returned to Texas. Taking several faithful friends into his confidence, he sent a trusty Mexican to the little village of Santa Rosa, which is only a short distance from Don Antonio's ranch, to distribute circulars announcing that Prof. Le Roy, a famous aeronaut, would make a balloon ascension from the plaza of the little pueblo on a certain day. Senorita Alma was well informed as to the part that she was expected to act in the plan that her daring lover had devised. Promptly at the appointed time Prof. Le Roy appeared on the plaza of Santa Rosa and began to inflate his monster balloon. The well-disguised lover mingled with the great crowd that had assembled to witness the ascension. The old don's curiosity had drawn him to the plaza, where he walked about, paying little attention to his daughter, for he thought that he had scared her audacious lover away. As the big balloon began to sway in the air, the lovers drew closer together, and at a signal from the aeronaut they approached the balloon. When the air ship was ready to start on its voyage Prof. Le Roy stepped into the basket and a secret signal was given. Before any one realized what was taking place, the daring lovers sprang over the side of the car and accomplices cut the ropes.

The airship shot towards the clouds, but not before Don Antonio had seen his daughter in the arms of the hated American. With the agility of a youth, he seized one of the ropes and, drawing his revolver, he shouted: "My daughter," and instantly fired. Le Roy seized a knife to cut the rope, but the girl caught his arm. She realized that the balloon was already so high in the air that the fall would kill her father. Howard grasped the situation, and with heroic generosity he turned to Le Roy and commanded him to let the airship descend. "I will doubtless lose my life," he said, "but I cannot consent to be responsible for the death of Alma's father. Don Antonio was still clinging to the rope and rapidly sending pistol balls into the car. The balloon slowly descended until the feet of the enraged father were almost upon the earth. Howard bent over the side of the car, and after cutting the rope he waved his hat at the old don, and shouted: "I will be good to Alma, and when you wish it we will come to see you." The airship, relieved of the weight of the defeated and furious old man, shot upwards again. The lovers could only hear howls of rage mingled with oaths, and they were glad to be beyond the reach of the desperate man who was clenching his fists and shaking his pistol towards them. Some hours afterward the balloon descended near the little city of Del Rio, in Texas, and the lovers took the evening train for San Antonio, where they soon found a priest, who made them happy.

Wonderful Feat of Memory.

That memory can be trained to a remarkable degree has long been admitted, but a test to which Henry M. Pillsbury, the chess expert, recently submitted was one of the most remarkable illustrations of mental capacity ever witnessed. While at the Northampton Club at South Bethlehem, Pa., not long ago he had, while blindfolded, participated in a team of four whist and at the same time contested in ten games of chess—nine of which he won, the other having been drawn—he offered to memorize thirty words, no matter how hard they might be, the selections to be read to him only once. Prof. Merriman, of Lehigh University, and Dr. Trelkeld Edwards, of Bethlehem, picked out most of the following words: Antiphlogistian, pereosteum, takadiastase, plasmin, ambrosia, Trelkeld, streptococcus, staphelococcus, micrococcus, plasmodium, Mississippi, Freiheit, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, American, Russia, philosophy, Piet-Potgieters-Rost, Salamagundi, Oomsillecootsi, Bangmamvato, Schlochter's Nek, Manzinyama, theosophy, catechism, Madjesoomslopa. Pillsbury memorized these words and repeated them in the order given and in the reverse order, and he did not have any difficulty in repeating them the next day.

How to Test Bank Notes.

There are many simple tests for fictitious bank notes. The most difficult feature to imitate in our somewhat cumbersome paper money is the watermark, but this can only be imitated properly by placing the forged bank note under a heavy die. Forgeries of this kind are detected by damping the note with a sponge. If the note is a genuine one the watermark will then stand out plainly, if a "duffer" it will almost disappear.

GIVE UP THEIR LIVES.

DOCTORS SOMETIMES DIE FOR THEIR PATIENTS.

Heroic Physicians Whose Devotion to Their Profession and to Humanity Lead Them to the Performance of Supreme Acts of Sacrifice.

A young girl who lived in the little village near Cork, Ireland, broke an artery in her chest and lost almost every drop of blood in her body. The doctor who was called had only been qualified a year and was not out of his twenties. He injected salt into his patient's veins to bring her around, then, turning to her naturally anxious parents, he said: "I can save her life if anyone will allow me to inject a quart of their blood into her system."

Although there were two strong sons in the room, neither said a word, but their mother, a delicate woman, volunteered to give the required quantity. The doctor saw at once that she required every drop she had in her body, and without another word he bared his arm, cut a vessel and allowed the blood to run into the veins of his patient. He saved the young lady's life, but he was never able to make good the blood he had lost, and about six months later he died.

Another case somewhat similar occurred in Salem, Mass. A wealthy merchant, as a result of an accident, lost a large quantity of blood, and when the doctor arrived he was lying in bed, white and apparently dead. The unfortunate man had only just been married, and his wife prayed to the doctor to save her husband's life. The doctor felt sure that if he gave his own blood to bring back the patient's life it would take him weeks to make good the loss, and that possibly he might never make it good at all. He would not allow the wife to make the sacrifice, but gave nearly a quart of his own blood. The merchant recovered, but the doctor who gave him back his strength and life is a feeble, pale-faced man, unable to work or follow his profession. He lives with the merchant and his wife, who look after him as if he were their own brother.

A country doctor died of typhus fever early in the year. He was called to attend a young man who was infected with the disease, and he went into the room where the patient lay and carefully examined the body. At the time the doctor was in a low state of health, and he caught the dreaded fever and died within a fortnight.

A young French doctor some time ago inoculated himself with cholera germs and suffered many weeks of serious illness in order to experiment with a new medicinal discovery which was believed to cure all germ diseases. Unfortunately, the medicine refused to act, and the plucky doctor died of the fever he had given himself.

When Koch's fluid was first discovered half a dozen German students were the first persons to have it injected into them. No one knew whether the fluid was not as deadly a poison as a dose of strychnine, and the men who allowed the drug to be injected into their systems are worthy of the highest praise. The dose given to them was far too powerful, and two of the number were nearly killed outright.

DID AS SHE WAS TOLD.

But the Footpad Was Much Surprised as a Consequence.

It happened out on a suburban boulevard the other night, and the heroine is an athletic girl out of high school only a year. The girl was returning to her home a little later than is customary for young women to be on the streets, and when she was within a block of her house a man sprang out from behind a tree and demanded her pocketbook. Upon the girl's hesitation to give up her money the man stepped nearer and growled:

"Hand me your pocketbook, and be quick about it, and don't make any fuss."

Now the pocketbook that the girl carried was the kind that has a strap which slips over the owner's hand, and when it is worn it lies over the back of the fingers.

When the man made a second demand for the pocketbook, the girl stepped close to him and "handed" it to him, but not in the manner expected. She just landed one on the jaw with the hand that carried the pocketbook. The leather spread out over the little fist, and as there was considerable silver in it, the blow was vicious. The robber went down in a heap.

He was on his feet in a second and came back at the girl with a look of the greatest surprise on his face.

"Hand me that pocketbook," he growled.

"All right," answered the girl, striking him again on the side of the jaw. This time the man did not get up so quickly, but lay a moment groaning on the ground. This was the advantage the girl was looking for, and she took to her heels and was soon within her home. And here follows another queer part of this true tale. When she flew through the doors of her home and was met by her mother and sisters, this strange girl didn't faint, but she just sat down and laughed a loud, ringing, wholesome laugh, and made light of her adventure, thus further shattering the traditions of her sex.—Kansas City Journal.

A MISSIONARY'S DRESS.

Why He Was Compelled to Adopt the Chinese Costume.

Dr. Crawford, my amiable Baptist host, who, with his wife, has been residing in China for nearly half a century, explained to me why the missionaries were compelled to abandon our Western dress. When he first came to China to preach the gospel he considered it hardly compatible with the dignity of an American citizen to wear a pigtail and felt slippers. Moreover, the Western dress appeared to him an advantage in his mission, as more liable to attract the attention and respect of the population in the different places he visited. In fact, no effort was needed to get an audience together, for great crowds usually collected about him, anxious to learn what the tall stranger with the stovepipe hat, narrow trousers and leather boots had to say. But hardly had he begun to preach to them in their own language than they became bolder, investigated the cut of his coat and trousers, touched his boots, interrupted him continually with all sorts of questions—how the leather boots were put on and off, where he got the trousers, how much the materials cost, and where he had learned their language—as if the God whom he preached interested them but little.

Tired of these continual interruptions, he at last determined to satisfy the curiosity of his listeners from the very outset. Arriving in the next village, he addressed the crowd assembled about him as follows: "Brothers, I hail from America; my trousers are made of wool stuff, to be got at Shanghai for 2 tiao per yard; my boots are made of calfskin, and are put on in the same way as the socks you are wearing; your language I acquired in Pekin, and I have come to tell you about the true God," etc. This, however, satisfied the audience but little. They waited patiently till he had finished, and then, instead of approaching him, crushed by the eternal truths, in order to ask for baptism, they again began questioning him about his trousers. Finally he became convinced that it was by far the best policy to adopt the Chinese dress, and for nearly fifty years he has worn no other.—Century.

PROTECTS THE HEN COOPS.

Burglar Alarm Designed to Warn Off Chicken Thieves.

"You might think," said an electrician, "that burglar alarms are made only for houses and stores and banks, and that sort of thing, but they have nowadays electric burglar alarms made for chicken coops to circumvent the chicken thief. The chicken house is so wired with the help of simple contrivances designed for that purpose that the opening of any door or window in its sets ringing a gong in the owner's house, which is connected with the chicken coop by wire, and the thief can't stop the gong's ringing by shutting the door or window again; it can be shut off in the house only.

"What's to hinder the thief cutting the wire? Why, nothing, I suppose, if he could find it in the dark, but while these alarms are set up with overhead wires from the coop to the house they may be connected by wires underground, suitable insulated wire being provided for this purpose. For that matter there is one system in which the alarm is started by the breaking of a wire. It is a more or less familiar fact that the chicken thief sometimes avoids all doors and windows, for fear of trap guns and that sort of thing, and just lifts a board off the roof to get at the chickens, this being a handy way also, because from there he can pick the chickens off the roost conveniently. But nowadays there runs across every board on the under side of the roof a light, easily broken wire, which is, however, sufficient to carry the required current. It is impossible to lift a board in the roof without breaking the slender wire, and, in this case, by means of suitable contrivances the breaking of the wire starts the bell to ringing.

"The cost of a chicken coop burglar alarm for a single chicken coop, wire connections with the house and all, would be very small, a few dollars. The cost of setting up a complete burglar alarm system for a big chicken ranch, with many coops and buildings, would of course be considerable, amounting to $300 or $400, more or less."—Chicago Chronicle.

Machine Paperhanging.

This is a German invention. The arrangement used is provided with a rod, upon which the roll of paper is placed. A paste receptacle with a brushing arrangement is attached in such a manner that the paste is applied automatically on the back of the paper. The end of the wall paper is fixed at the bottom of the wall, and the implement rises on the wall, and only needs to be set by one workman. While the wall paper unrolls, and, provided with paste, is held against the wall, an elastic roller follows on the outside, which presses it firmly to the wall. When the wall paper has reached the top, the workman pulls a cord, whereby it is cut off from the remainder of the roll.

Ball-Bearing Watch.

One of the most ingenious devices at the Paris fair was to be seen in the Swiss watch factory exhibit and consists of a ball-bearing pocket timepiece. The principle has been already applied to the driving wheel of the clockmaker's throw and also for the winding arbor of clocks. Its application to a watch, however, with satisfactory results requires exceedingly fine mechanism and minuteness. The watch was made by Leon Gruet, a foreman of a Parisian watch concern. In it the arbors roll on steel balls of two sizes. It is spoken of by competent authorities as one of the most interesting horological exhibits.

It seems to be a debatable question with a woman these days whether to take a poor husband to a woman's magazine for treatment, or to the Lord in prayer.

Without the earth the brickmaker would have to give up his occupation.

AUTO'S FIGHT FIRES.

PARIS INTRODUCES THE ELECTRIC ENGINES.

Prove Great Time Savers and Prompt Extinguishers of Flames—Noise and Bustle of Horse and Steam Apparatus Extinct—Description of Machines.

In Paris electricity has gained another victory over horse and steam power. The fire department is now abolishing horses from all the fire engine houses of the city and is selling its old-fashioned steam fire engines to country towns.

It is a strange sight when the fire alarm sounds to see the ponderous doors of the engine houses fly open and from it emerge the modern electric fire engine manned by only two sappeurs. There is none of the old stamping and dashing of fiery steeds, impatient to rush down the crowded avenues to the scenes of conflagration. Here again, of course, is the spectacle of the loss of occupation to a lot of brave fellows. The stable-keepers and the grooms have been driven out. Instead there is a single engineer for each vehicle, whose sole occupation is to keep his auto-engines in trim during the long leisure hours between fires and to manipulate them when the fire alarm sounds.

The engine and the hook and ladder hurry to the fires in much quicker time than the fastest horses could have done. All the old dash of wind, almost uncontrollable horses, driven by a man who seems on the point of being dragged from his seat; the confusing sounding of gongs and bells and shouting of the sappeurs, cursing of drivers and street passengers, taken unawares—all this is a thing of the past. Instead the trim electric fire engine wends its way with comparatively little noise and conspicuity through the crowded thoroughfares. All that warns of its approach is the constant ringing of a loud electric bell, which does not vary even when the passage is obstructed. The police, however, are instructed to arrest the driver of any vehicle that does not at once respond to the electric warning.

AUTOMOBILE FIRE ENGINE EQUIPMENT.

Much Time Is Saved.

There is much time saved at the engine house by the dispatch with which the new machines can be manned and started, and, of course, there is a great saving of time en route and on the spot of the fire, as electricity proves a stronger pumping power than steam.

The new machines of the Paris fire department were the center of attraction at the international congress which was held at Vincennes. Three types of the electric fire automobile were exhibited. There was an electric hose engine, an electric tool wagon and a hook and ladder.

On the hose engine there is a large water reservoir with a capacity of 150 gallons. The entire weight is less than 3,000 pounds. The electric motor which propels the vehicle is transformed as soon as the place of fire is reached into a pump. There is no need of waiting until the fire plug on the nearest corner is unscrewed and the hose adjusted to it. There is enough water in the reservoir to begin work, and often a blaze is extinguished before the reservoir is replenished.

The rapidity of the new fire fighter is increased by the manner in which the rubber hose is wound around a metal reel. The hose around the apparatus is always filled with water and the pressing of a button unwinds it automatically, so that the firemen's task of handling it is greatly facilitated. In fact, the only thing to be done on the spot is to open the stop cock of the mouthpiece of the hose and direct it on the flames.

Prompt Work at Fires.

While the engine has begun its work the auto-hook and ladder, manned by six stalwart fellows, is busy providing for a fresh supply of water. The firemen have the big ladders, saving apparatus and the numerous extinguishing paraphernalia ready for any emergency. The fire hose is supplied with three different mouthpieces, by which the pressure of the water can be regulated; one of them pours out the water at the rate of seventy-five gallons per minute.

An excellent arrangement with the new automobile fire wagons is the electric lighting, which is adjusted by wire alongside the hose. This is of great importance, as often it is necessary to throw light in dark corners where persons may be lying unconscious, overcome by smoke, and to guard against accidents to the firemen.

The big ladder lies when folded in an almost horizontal condition on the auto-truck and is raised to its full perpendicular height by electricity. The stability of this big apparatus is remarkable, providing against all possible mishaps.

The municipal authorities are highly pleased over the innovation and it is believed that the initiative will be emulated in all the large cities of the continent.

YOUNG HERO'S MISFORTUNE.

Lost Hearing and Power of Speech in the Philippines.

A smooth-faced young man, straight as an arrow, and dressed in the uniform of a private in the United States army, stepped up to the desk at the Hotel Denechaud the other day and registered as Charles Kappeler, Portland, Me.

"Do you wish the American or European plan?" inquired the clerk, with his customary professional smile of greeting.

The soldier shook his head, picked up a bit of paper and wrote: "I am deaf and dumb." A brisk correspondence began between the hotel man and Private Kappeler, and this is the way the soldier told his story, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat:

Kappeler was in Funston's famous regiment, the Twentieth Kankas, and was a member of Company A. He went to the Philippines and saw active service until one day, after a forced march and much exposure in the rain, something went wrong with the young private's head. Everything turned black before his eyes and his musket dropped from his hands. He whirled about and fell to the ground unconscious.

The Filipinos were peppering away at the Kansas boys at the time Kappeler fell, and it was supposed by his comrades that he had been wounded or killed. But when the enemy was driven off and Kappeler was picked up and carried back it was found he hadn't been hit at all. There was not a mark on him, but he did not recover consciousness. He was put into a cot in the Second Reserve Hospital at Manila and in that cot he lay for a whole year.

"I was unconscious for four weeks," the deaf and dumb man wrote, "and when I came to I found a Red Cross nurse bending over me and giving me whisky and medicine and putting ice on my head. I saw by the motion of her lips that she was speaking to me, but I could not hear a word she said. I soon discovered I was deaf and then gradually I lost the power of speech, for, as I could not hear what I was saying, I could not form the words. At last I entirely lost the power of speech, and I have been deaf and dumb ever since."

They Piled It On.

"They do things their own way up in New England," said the tramp on the park bench as he gazed at a big toe peeping through the shoe. "For instance, up in New Hampshire I was crossing a field when a bull took after me. As he was about to pick me up on his horns I dodged and he went full tilt against a tree and broke his neck."

"Well, what was done?" was asked.

"Why, they arrested me for trespass. On top of that they charged me with inciting a bull to mischief. Then I was held for the worth of the bull, and before they got through with me I was in jail for eleven months. I'd have got another month if there hadn't been a slip. When the bull broke his neck the farmer's wife fainted away, and they meant to tack on thirty days more to pay the farmer for her lost time while unconscious."—Washington Post.

Pneumatic Tubes.

Pneumatic tubes for carrying messages are an old story in the largest European cities. But the largest in use there, those in London, are only three inches in diameter. It is only in the United States that the whole bulk of letter mail is handled between given points. In New York a tube reaching to Brooklyn is three and a half miles long and eight inches in diameter, allowing the passage of a pouch containing 600 letters in about seven minutes.

THE HORSE IN BATTLE.

Even When Mortally Wounded He Will Try to Remain Standing.

A veteran cavalry horse partakes of the hopes and fears of battle just the same as his rider. As the column swings into line and waits the horse grows nervous over the waiting. If the wait is spun out, he will tremble and sweat and grow apprehensive. If he has been six months in service, he knows every bugle call. As the call comes to advance, the rider can feel him working at the bit with his tongue to get it between his teeth. As he moves out, he will either seek to get on faster than he should or bolt. He cannot bolt, however. The lines will carry him forward, and after a minute he will grip, lay back his ears, and one can feel his sudden resolve to brave the worst and have done with it as soon as possible.

A man seldom cries out when hit in the turmoil of battle. It is the same with a horse. Five troopers out of six, when struck with a bullet, are out of their saddles within a minute. If hit in the breast or shoulder, up go their hands, and they get a heavy fall; if in the leg or foot or arm, they fall forward and roll off.

Even with a foot cut off by a jagged piece of shell a horse will not drop. It is only when shot through the head or heart that he comes down. He may be fatally wounded, but hobbles out of the fight to right or left and stands, with drooping head, until the loss of blood brings him down.

The horse that loses his rider and is unwounded himself will continue to run with his set of fours until some movement throws him out. Then he goes galloping here and there, neighing with fear and alarm, but he will not leave the field. In his racing about he may get among the dead and wounded, but he will dodge them, if possible, and in any case leap over them. When he has come upon three or four other riderless steeds, they fall in and keep together as if for mutual protection, and the "rally" of the bugle may bring the whole of them into ranks in a body.—Public Opinion.

PLAINT OF A MILLIONAIRE.

No Fun In Life For a Man Who Has Acquired Enormous Wealth.

What is the smallest income on which a man may live in New York? was the question I asked today of a noted banker, whose income cannot be less than $100,000 a year. "Well," he replied, "my household expenses alone amount to $25,000 a year, and I do not see how I possibly could live on less than that." Then a reminiscent smile began to cross his countenance, and, heaving a little sigh, he said: "But the happiest time of my life was when my wife and I and two children lived here on $2,500 a year. After all, happiness doesn't depend on the amount of a man's income

"I was quite intimate with William H. Vanderbilt when he was considered the richest man in the country. I met him one day in Fifth avenue and said to him that he ought to be the happiest man in the world. 'I am not,' the great millionaire replied. 'My health is shattered, and all the money I possess cannot restore it. I cannot even drive one of my fine horses. It is painful for me to sit down. My only possible exercise is for me to walk down the avenue. I receive threatening letters daily, and my nerves are so unstrung that I am constantly afraid that some assassin will waylay me. I am overrun with people who want to get money. I am the most wretched man in New York, and I tell you that after a person has accumulated enough to secure him against poverty and gratify his reasonable wants every dollar in addition is a burden and weighs him down.'"—Philadelphia Ledger.

Romance of Siam's Great Peaks.

Siam's greatest mountain range is the Sam Roi Yawt, or the 300 peaks. A quaint legend which explains their origin is set forth by the Siamese geologists as follows:

"It appears that one Mong Lai and his wife once inhabited the neighborhood (they were giants), and each promised their daughter in marriage, unknown to the other, to a different suitor. At last the day of the nuptials arrived, and Chao Lai and the Lord of Mleang Chin (China) both arrived to claim the bride. When the horrified father found how matters stood—having a regard for the value of a promise, which is not too common in the east—he cut his daugher in half so that neither suitor should be disappointed.

"Chao Lai in the meantime, on finding that he had a rival, committed suicide, and the peak of Chao Lai is the remains of his body. The unfortunate bride is to be found in the islands off Sam Roi Yawt, the peaks of which are the remains of the gifts which were to be made to the holy man who was to solemnize the wedding, while Kaw Chang and Kaw King, on the east side of the gulf, are the elephant and buffalo cart in which the presents were brought."

He Was Acquitted.

Here the voice of counsel for the defense thrilled with emotion.

"Gentlemen of the jury," he cried, "you cannot believe the prisoner to be the cool, calculating villain the prosecution would make him out to be! Were he cool and calculating would he have murdered his wife, as he is accused of doing? Would he not rather have spared her in order that she might be here at this trial to weep for him and influence your verdict with her tears?"

Columbus Brought Cards.

Christopher Columbus introduced cards into America in 1492. On the quarter deck of the Santa Maria he used to play the stately game of ombre, a favorite among princes, nobles and courtiers, with its Spanish name, el hombre (the man), and the Spanish terms, spadille, manille, punto, matador, basto, gano del rey and codilla.

He Cashes Pay Checks.

New York pays its employees by check, and each pay day sees a great many men with their whole month's salary in their hand, but no money. Various bankers whose places of business are near the city hall are willing to cash the city's checks, but they charge a commission, usually 10 cents on each $100.

The proprietor of a saloon near the city hall is willing to cash the checks without charging a commission, and on pay days his establishment is jammed with officials. He makes his profit on the increased sale of liquids at his bar, for no man after having his check cashed leaves the place without buying a drink. The proprietor of the establishment provides against the city pay day by drawing $25,000 from the bank and hiring a man to take entire charge of the check cashing business. Frequently the entire $25,000 is exchanged for checks. When this happens, the proprietor sends for more money. No city employee asks to have his pay check cashed and is not accommodated, and the extra pay day sales at the bar are a considerable feature of the year's trade.—New York Sun.

A Clever Dog.

There is more in a dog than man's philosophy accounts for. No theory of instinct—sometimes defined as a faculty prior to experience and independent reason—will explain some actions of a clever dog whose case is reported by a correspondent of the London Spectator:

I knew a dog in Ireland—a retriever—who had been taught always to bring his own tin dish in his mouth, to be filled at the late dinner. For some reason his master wished to make a change and to feed him twice a day instead of once.

The dog resented this, and, when told to bring the dish, refused, and it could nowhere be found, on which his master spoke angrily to him and ordered him to bring the dish at once.

With drooping tail and sheepish expression he went down the length of the garden and began scratching up the soil, where he had buried the bowl deep down to avoid having to bring it at an hour of which he did not approve.

Good Ear For That Music.

"There's a man who has a good ear for music," remarked the dyspeptic man who was bothered by the piano playing of the young woman next door.

"Who, Dumley? Why, he's deaf as a post," replied his friend.

"I know he is," said the dyspeptic man.—Philadelphia Press.

The Colonel's Romance.

"Colonel," said the romantic girl, "tell me how you got that scar upon your left cheek. Oh, I just know it must be a thrilling story. Was it made by a bullet or a saber thrust? I prefer a saber thrust. It seems so much more like the knighthood of old. You can't see a bullet coming, and there is no way to escape it or combat it, but when your enemy rushes at you with his uplifted saber there is the possibility of parrying his blow and cutting him down. That seems much more manly, even if the victor in the fray does receive a wound or two, than to just be laid low or to lay the enemy low by a bullet that cannot be seen. There is no bravery in shooting a man, but there is something knightly in meeting another face to face with a sword. Your scar looks like one that was left by a gleaming blade, and I know that your enemy must at least have been rendered hors de combat. Tell me all about it, colonel—when it happened and how. I am so interested in war stories."

"Yes," he replied, "I agree with you fully about the sword and saber business. There isn't much bravery in shooting a fellow, and there is something knightly about standing up and thrusting and parrying with a blade. But I got this wound while acting as an innocent bystander at a Chicago strike riot. It was a brick."—Chicago Times-Herald.

The Soldier and His Heart.

Very few soldiers who have seen much service escape what is called battle heart.

The ordinary state of the heart in healthy people is one of irritability, but in the soldier of five or six years' service the irritability is so great that it constantly affects his temper.

The soldier wears such tight clothing that his heart has not room to beat freely, and the perpetual struggle to do its work under difficulties injures it. The soldiers' trousers are tight at the waist. His coat is buttoned as tightly as possible and very often he squeezes himself with a belt.

Then when on the march his chest is compressed by the weight of his knapsack, canteen, great coat and heavy cartridge belt.

If you watch a company of soldiers when they are doing a long march, you will observe that most of them have flushed faces, red ears, red noses, swollen necks—showing that the heart is greatly overtaxed. Some, on the other hand, are pale, which proves that their hearts are not equal to the work thrown on them.

When, after a very long march, the men have to deploy into fighting order, and perhaps rush a hill, a very large number break down altogether. Their overstrained hearts never become really strong and healthy again.—Answers.

The Origin of Phœnix Park.

The origin of the name of Phœnix park has puzzled many scholars unacquainted with the Irish language. The manor was called in the Irish vernacular Fionn-uisge, pronounced finniske, which signifies clear or fair water, and which, articulated in the brief English manner, exactly resembled the word phœnix. The spring or well so called from which the park derives its name still exists close to the Dublin entrance of the viceregal lodge. It is situated in a glen beside the lower lake and is one of the romantic objects of the park.—London News.

Formalin Treatment For Grain.

Hot water treatment for oat smuts must be done just right, and all farmers do not have the facilities. Formalin is easier to use, one pound to 50 gallons of water. This is either sprinkled on with a watering pot, one gallon to a bushel of oats, or the oats are dipped in the solution. In each case they should stand two hours before being dried out, says an exchange.

J. S. Stotler and J. Harry Cole are in town, from Ballarat.

Mrs. Thos. Key, of Bishop, died in a San Francisco hospital January 28.

A. Diaz admitted, this morning, that he brought this cold snap up from Lone Pine.

Jno. L. Bourland, of Bishop, was in Independence last Monday, on land business.

According to latest advices, P. A. Chalfant is much better and hopes brighter.

A letter from J. J. Stewart of Lone Pine conveys word that Paul Z. Houard died in Los Angeles on the 22d instant.

Some travelers or possibly local vandals have been damaging fences on the Hodge ranch. It is a dangerous pastime.

The Mulhollands are in clover having got over the summit in a lucky time between snows. But then they kick about a little "glorious rain" over there.

The Agricultural Department distribution of garden and flower seed for this section, through Senator Bard, will—we presume—come around all right some time. As yet the seeds have not been received. Requests filed will be honored in their order.

We reprint the following from the Los Angeles Times:

"P. H. Mack, an attorney and mining man of Inyo county, is visiting his family in Los Angeles. In conversation with a Times reporter he stated that the Reward Gold Mining Company, of which J. D. Thomson of Pasadena is President, has developed one of the finest mines in California. One year ago Mr. Thomson bought the property, including a ten-stamp quartz mill, with water power, for $25,000. This purchase price was paid before the time provided for its payment. Development work is prosecuted vigorously, and more than sufficient ore is taken out in development work to keep the mill running steadily. At the present time there is at least 40,000 tons of ore blocked out in one mine that will assay from $18 to $20 a ton in gold. The company intends to put in electric drills and make other improvements which will reduce the cost of mining and milling to less than $3.50 per ton. Adjoining the Reward on the north is the Eclipse mine, owned by Independence and San Francisco parties. This mine is now bonded and a contract has been let to sink the present main incline to a depth of 575 feet. This mine looks as promising as did the Reward when the latter was purchased by Thomson."

About the Mines.

Messrs. Laws & Farrington continue to prosecute development work in their Bunker Hill mine, at Lead Canyon, and they make shipments of good ore.

J. D. Thomson, President and Manager of the Reward, arrived last Tuesday. The mine is looking fine, there being fully twenty feet of high grade ore exposed in bottom of incline and no foot-wall reached.

C. D. Rooklidge, manager for the Salt Lake company operating the Reddy mines at Darwin, is in San Francisco, investigating a new dry concentrating process. He intends erecting a 100-ton plant at the mines within the next three months.

A deal has been closed for the sale by Homer S. King, Henry Wadsworth, Thomas B. Bishop and Thos. B. Pheby of their one-third interest in the Oh Be Joyful group of mines near Ballarat for $16,000 to W. S. James, of Los Angeles. The purchaser paid $8000 in cash and has ninety days to pay the balance. Attorney Mack, of Independence, made the sale.

W. W. Godsmark has been appointed President and Manager of the Radcliff Consolidated Gold mines. A receiver is now in possession of the property, under the foreclosure of mortgage proceedings instigated by Wells, Fargo & Co.'s bank. The new manager hopes to make arrangements by which he will be permitted to resume active mining operations.

Without attempting to analyze the proposition, pro or con., a glance at the records in office of County Recorder shows that the "oil fever" is on and prevails about the Owens Lake Basin. Locations made last week cover 3960 acres, in addition to the 5920 acres previously recorded. Below Little Lake the Salt Wells Valley landscape is more or less adorned by the presence of advance locators. We will have to assume that there is some merit at basis of all this speculation, but it will be more satisfactory to our readers to know whether or not any of the parties are actually boring for oil. When that occurs it will be a tangible event to chronicle.

There has been recorded in the County Recorder's office a bond from A. W. Eibeshutz and his co-owners to P. H. Mack on the Brown Monster mine, generally called the Eclipse, for $15,000—one thousand payable before February 1st, and the balance by August 1st. The $1000 payment was made last Tuesday. At the same time there was recorded a contract between Mr. Mack and Mr. Eibeshutz under which the latter agrees to sink the main incline an additional 150 feet depth for $1,400. This work is to be completed by May 10th and Mr. Mack has the right to drift, in the aggregate, 100 feet from the main incline. A force of men has been put at work, Mr. Geo. Montgomery being in charge. It is understood here that President Thomson of the Reward Company is behind Mr. Mack in this deal.

MRS. BREWER RECOMMENDS PERUNA FOR GRIP AND FEMALE CATARRH.

The Home of Mrs. Lizzie M. Brewer at Westerly, R. I.

In a letter to Dr. Hartman concerning the merits of Pe-ru-na, Mrs. Brewer writes, among other things:

Westerly, R. I.

"Dear Dr. Hartman—I find Pe-ru-na a sure cure for all catarrhal affections so common in this part of the country. It cures a cold at once. There is no cough medicine that can at all equal Pe-ru-na. As for la grippe, there is no other remedy that can all compare with Pe-ru-na.

"I am among the sick a great deal in our city and have supplied many invalids with Pe-ru-na, simply because I am enthusiastic in my faith as to its results. I have never known it to fail to quickly and permanently remove that demoralized state of the human system which follows la grippe.

"In all cases of extreme weakness I use Pe-ru-na with perfect confidence of a good result. In cases of weakness peculiar to my sex I am sure that no other remedy can approach in good results the action of Peruna. It meets all the bad symptoms to which females are subject. The irregularities and nervousness, the debility and miseries which afflict more or less the women from girlhood to change of life, are one and all met and overcome by this excellent remedy. I wish every young lady in our city could read your book.

"Mrs. Lizzie M. Brewer."

Peruna will cure the worst cases of catarrh. La grippe is acute epidemic catarrh, for which Peruna is a specific.

Mrs. J. W. Reynolds, New Lisbon, Ohio, suffered for many years with chronic catarrh of the lungs, head and throat; continuous cough; many physicians failed to cure. Permanently cured by Peruna. Thousands of testimonials could be produced. A valuable treatise on catarrh sent free by The Pe-ru-na Medicine Company, Columbus, O.

How He Got Religion.

"Did you ever get religion?" asked the revivalist.

"Well, I should say so—138 pounds of it," replied the man.

"A hundred and thirty-eight pounds of religion!" cried the revivalist. "How did you get that?"

"The only way that a good many men ever get religion," was the reply; "I married it."—Chicago Post.

Baffled.

"There's no use," said Mr. Cumrox. "I ain't going to try to superintend the education of my daughters any more."

"Why not?"

"They're getting along where I can't follow 'em. I hear 'em chattering sometimes, and I can't tell whether they are reciting their Latin lessons or 'counting out' for a game of hide and seek."—Washington Star.

Walking Fish.

The "walking fish" of Santa Catalina channel, California, is a member of the pediculati tribe and has congeners among the gulf weed of the Mexican coast. Its pectoral fins are shaped so as to serve for legs, and it can rest on them so as to snap its prey. It builds a nest of seaweed.

Wanted a Big Collar.

It was told of Daniel Webster that when he asked at a Boston haberdasher's one day for a collar or "dickey" the clerk took a critical look at his customer's neck and then said: "We haven't got your size. You'll have to go to the next store around the corner for it." That was a harness maker's who made a specialty of horse collars.

The Boy Aboard Ship.

Mr. Frank T. Bullen, who was once a ship boy himself, makes in his book, "The Men of the Merchants' Service," these mournful statements concerning the sea life of young Jacky:

"Within the memory of middle aged men a boy on board a ship was the butt, the vicarious sacrifice to all the accumulated ill temper of the ship. To-day tales are told of the treatment of boys in 'Geordie' colliers that are enough to make the flesh creep to hear. In those days it was the privilege of every man on board to ill treat the boy, and if, as very often happened, the poor little wretch died under it—well, what of it?—it was only a boy.

"And the peculiar part of it all was that the brutes who did these evil deeds prided themselves that their actions were right and proper. There was only one way of training a boy—with a rope's end if it were handy; if not, a fist or a boot would do, but he must be beaten.

"One man whom I shall always remember, as smart a seaman as ever trod a ship's deck, beat me until there was not a square inch of my small body unbruised. Scarcely a watch passed that I did not receive some token of his interest in my welfare, and on two occasions he kicked me with such violence that with all the will in the world to obey his orders I was perfectly helpless. My only wonder is that he did not kill me.

"Yet when I left the ship he bade me quite an affectionate farewell, bidding me remember how hard he had labored for my benefit, that every blow he had given me was solely aimed at making me more useful and fitting me for my duties."

Swindle by Pawn Tickets.

The most lucrative game which New York swindlers work on the credulous and eager New Yorkers themselves continues to be the bogus or false pawn ticket swindle. It is not unknown in Chicago, and it has so many fine points about it, all of them appealing to the man who loves to make a few dollars on the side, that the rogues who work it are never out of customers. The simplest method is for the swindler to tell his intended victim he has in pawn a ring or gem worth $100. He claims to have pawned it for only $25, and rather than lose the difference between the real value and the amount for which he pawned it he will give the customer a rare bargain. There is $25 due the pawnbroker, besides $5 interest, leaving an equity of $70. He will sell that equity for just half, or $35. After the victim has paid over the $35 and has redeemed the pledge he finds that the real value of the article is $50 to $60 and that he is out $5 to $15. The pawnbroker gets all he loaned, and the original owner makes all the victim overpaid.—Chicago Tribune.

Reminiscence of a Thespian.

At Brighton Beach I hit Mose Rosenstein, who was organizing a one night "Faust" company, for a job.

"What part do you wish to take?" he inquired shortly.

"I wish to take the place of Mephistopheles, of course," I answered, drawing myself up proudly, for I had on a new suit of clothes and could afford to look him in the face.

"And why do you wish to take that particular part?" he inquired.

I was amazed at his dullness; but, concealing my disgust as far as possible, I explained that it was because the devil always gets his dues. He seemed pleased at my repartee, wrote me out a $500 per week contract and paid me my first week's salary of $7.50 in advance. I played the devil in "Faust" until nearly the end of the season, after which I was cast in "The Foundry," a workingman's play.—Indianapolis Sun.

Her Criticism.

Mary is very stout, quite deaf and the trusted housemaid of a family in the East park section. Incidentally she seems to be something of an art critic. When she cleans the family rooms she is heard to mutter and shake her head in dusting the pictures, and she seems to be especially severe on a few representatives of the "altogether" that hang in the little den. One day Mary was flirting her dustcloth about in this little room when her mistress happened in. Mary was standing gazing intently at a beautiful photograph of Bouguereau's "Cupid and Psyche."

"And phwat pictur' is that?" asked Mary in hard, cold tones.

"Oh, that is 'Cupid and Psyche,'" said the lady rather indifferently.

"Moody and Sankey, is it? Well, I nav' heered of them felleys. Sure, they ought to be ashamed of theirselves."—Philadelphia Record.

LABOR NOTES

Norway has 2,941 factories.

Porto Rico has a labor paper.

St. Louis has 65,000 unionists.

Seventy-nine firms are now using the blue label of the Tobacco Workers' Union.

In England during the last four years, it is claimed, 140,320 farm laborers have been displaced by machinery, while the making of the latter, it is asserted, required only the labor of 4,600 men for one year.

Victoria, Australia, has built seven local railways on the co-operative principle. The railways were estimated for by contract at £547,908, but by working the co-operative principle they were completed for £251,211.

The union of garment workers of Indianapolis, Ind., recently initiated 143 new members at one meeting. The large factories in that city now employ none but members of the union, the membership of which is about 400.

Efforts of the mine owners of British Columbia to secure the annulment of the eight-hour law have proved unsuccessful. The operators produced a lot of decisions handed down in the United States declaring the eight-hour law unconstitutional, but they were informed by the authorities that Canada is not yet a part of the United States.

The International Wood Carvers' Association convention has prepared a bill for presentation to congress authorizing the United States government to acquire and set aside 5,000,000 acres of land to be parceled out and distributed, through the Department of Agriculture, to workingmen who have been crowded from the mechanical trades by labor-saving machinery, and whose only hope now for a living is in the land. The government would thus reduce the army of unemployed and discontented workingmen, and at the same time cultivate a larger taste for agricultural pursuits among Americans. The bill provides that transportation and farming implements be given to worthy applicants.

ELECTRIC TIME ALARM.

Sleeper Can't Stop It Until He Gets Up to Stay.

When the bell of an ordinary alarm clock begins to ring the sleeper is apt to wake up sufficiently to think it will stop soon, and as he is not compelled to arise and stop it the result is often another nap, with its consequent delays throughout the day. This objection has led to the designing of the continuous ringing alarm, of which several are already in use. The electric alarm, which we show in the accompanying picture, has just been patented by Simon Wolf, of Essen, Germany, and has at least one novelty to recommend it. It is directly connected to the bed, and it is impossible for the sleeper to stop it until he gets up to stay. Underneath the bed is a series of contact points, one of which is shown in the picture, the weight of the person forcing them together. A clock is used in connection with the apparatus, and as soon as the hour of rising is indicated the remaining opening or break in the wire is closed, the current passing through the contact points underneath the bed and causing the bell to ring continuously until the sleeper, by leaving the bed, breaks the circuit. Should he lie down again the circuit is again completed and the bell rings until the second rising.

RINGS UNTIL SLEEPER ARISES.

An Artificial Moon.

The artificial "moon" for lighting the great domed reading room of Columbia University Library has now begun to shine. It is hung in the center of the ceiling, just where the dome begins to curve upwards, and the inner surface of the dome being painted blue, the moon is seen as if projected against a clear sky. The moon is a wooden globe, seven feet in diameter, painted a dead white, so that it should reflect 70 or 80 per cent of the light projected upon it. On this globe light is projected from eight strong electric arc lights placed at regular intervals round the walls, and so masked as to be invisible to persons on the floor level. The moon thus lighted up shines brilliantly, but its light can hardly be sufficient for the reading students, as it is said to be less than that of a full moon shining overhead from a clear sky. Readers have, however, incandescent lamps on the tables, the moon being primarily designed to display the dome and the upper parts of the great hall. This it is to do beautifully without subjecting the beholders to an unpleasant glare of light.

Tall Prehistoric Men.

Near Worms, Germany, a few days ago, a number of prehistoric tombs were laid bare containing skeletons of what must have been an exceedingly tall race of people, all buried in a stooping posture. The relics are assigned to a period 4,000 years ago.

Good Fish Story from India.

A curious incident of the recent floods in Calcutta was the stopping of a tram in Dalhousie square, the very heart of the city, by a large fish, which was swimming in the street and got caught in the wheel.

Politeness is important, but ability will beat it.

STEER BY THE STAR.

Night on the sea and one lone[illegible]
In the midst of the darkness [illegible]re;
A trackless waste spread all a[illegible]t,
And the blackness everywhe[illegible]
But gleaming in the sky above,
Are seen the beacons of the night,
Set there to guide that lo[illegible]ly ship
Across the pathless sea aright.

The waves roll high and toss the ship,
A plaything on their turbid crest;
The sea lifts up its eager arms
And opens wide its heaving breast.
But safely still the vessel rides,
For one there is who guides aright,
Because his eyes are fixed upon
Those faithful beacons of the night.

No vessel sailing Over Life's sea
But safely may the harbor find
If the Great Beacon of the sky
Be ever kept in sight and mind.
The light at times may shine but dim,
The way seem dark, the harbor far,
But he cannot get off the course
Who guides his vessel by the Star.

YOUR OWN VOICE.

You Would Be Surprised if You Heard Its Exact Imitation.

"One of the strangest things in life," said an amateur philosopher of Camp street, "is the fact that we never really become acquainted with our physical selves. Here I have been living in this body of mine for nearly 50 years, yet I have no idea how I look, how I bear myself, what sort of an impression I make on the minds of others when they meet me in daily intercourse. I don't even know how my own voice sounds, although I've been listening to it ever since I can remember. Did you ever hear yourself talk in a phonograph? No? Well, try it the next time you have a chance, and you will not only be astonished, but, what is still stranger, you will be disappointed, probably a little shocked. Everybody has that experience.

"I supposed that I was perfectly familiar with my own voice and thought privately that it was rather agreeable. I had been told so plenty of times by other people and never knew that they were only 'jollying' me until I made a phonographic 'record' and set it grinding. At the first word I jumped back in dismay and nearly pulled my ears off in the listening tubes.

"'Merciful heavens!' I said to myself. 'Is it possible I talk like that?' I thought there must be something the matter with the cylinder and called in a friend to hear it. He grinned with delight. 'That's one of the most natural records I ever heard in my life,' he declared heartily, and I yearned for his throat.

"But, as I just remarked, everybody who tries the experiment has the same experience. The voice is always absolutely unfamiliar and positively unpleasant. Yet there is a certain something about it that differentiates it from any other voice you ever heard in your life—something indescribable that gives you a little secret thrill clear down to the soles of your feet. It is the voice of the mysterious body which you inhabit and don't know."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

A Lunatic's Wit.

As Horace Mann sat in his study one evening an insane man rushed into the room and after abusing him for all kinds of fancied grievances challenged him to a fight.

Mr. Mann replied: "My dear fellow, it would give me a great pleasure to accommodate you, but I can't do it, the odds are so unfair. I am a Mann by name and a man by nature—two against one! It would never do to fight."

The insane man answered: "Come ahead. I am a man and a man beside myself. Let us four have a fight."

DORKIN'S NIGHT.

The theater was full, it was Christmas night,
And Dorkins was going to play
A character new to himself and the stage
He'd trod for so many a day.
By eight the theater was perfectly jammed,
All waiting a pleasant surprise,
For they knew that they'd laugh till their sides would ache;
And they longed for the curtain to rise.
The curtain arose, the play soon began,
And eagerly watched each eye
For Dorkins to make his first entrance, and then
To give him a cheerful hi! hi!

At length he appeared amid loud applause,
But something was wrong, I could see,
Why "Dorkins is playing quite badly to-night,"
The people said, sitting 'round me.
A hiss! Yes, it was, I saw Dorkins start,
As if stung by a serpent's fang,
And cast a beseeching look around
While his head on his breast he did hang.
"He's drunk!" some one said, and I thought so myself,
For to me it was painful at times
To see how he'd struggle along with his part,
And constantly stick in his lines.

At length to the footlights he slowly approached,
And "Ladies and gentlemen," said,
"If I have not pleased you to-night, my dear friends,
The fault's not the heart, but the head.
There's many a time I've made you all laugh,
When so ill I could scarcely well stand,
When every moment was pain to me, yes!
If even I'd raise but my hand.
You've hissed me to-night, and think that I'm drunk,"
From his heart came a sob and a moan,
"I'll tell you the reason, I know you won't laugh, I've a little one dying at home."
—Bobby Newcomb.

DAME URSULA'S GOLD.

NEARLY fifty years ago, in the city of New York, not far from what is now called the Battery, there stood a square and gloomy looking edifice of stone, then occupied by an old dame, Ursula Bond. The house was rapidly crumbling to decay with age and want of proper care.

Ursula Bond dwelt there in grim loneliness, forcing the beautiful and artless Leonora, only child of her deceased daughter, to live with her, and to do all those menial tasks for the performance of which all others would have demanded money.

Leonora was in her seventeenth year, when, one evening in June as she looked from the door ere she should bar, bolt and lock it for the night, a frank and manly voice called out from a near heap of old boards where the owner of the voice had been watching for more than an hour:

"Leo!"

"Hist!" whispered the maiden. "Is it you, Walter?"

"Is the coast all clear?" was the reply as a tall and handsome youth of 22 years showed his activity by gaining the side of the maiden by a bound that cleared fully ten feet.

"It is lucky for you, dear Walter," said the maiden, "that Dame Ursula is not in hearing, or that bold pate of thine would be greeted with a taste of her staff."

"That for her staff!" said Walter, as he snapped his fingers. "But where is she?"

"Writing in the back bedroom."

"Ah, adding up her gains, the old cross, mean——"

"Walter! Remember she is my grandmother."

"I only wish she was mine," said Walter. "And if she lives long enough she will be, won't she?"

"If you behave yourself," replied Leonora, pretending to refuse the kiss he gave. "But why have you tortured yourself?"

"By boarding so near you, eh?" said Walter. "Because you must let me remain in the house all night. This morning as I was going to my work I passed the open window of an ale shop and I heard a strange voice mention your name. The voices in the ale shop were speaking in French, which you know I have learned by night study. Well, I heard enough to tell me that the strangers—there were two of them—intend to pay Dame Ursula a visit some time between midnight and dawn, and for no good purpose. So here I am to act as your defender."

"But you should have told the police."

"Bah! for the police!" said Walter Brandon. "Am I not a match for two men who speak bad French?"

"But, my dear Walter——"

But Walter had vanished into the house and vanished as quickly as one of those bats he had mentioned.

Leonora was in great perplexity, yet as she had boundless faith in the discretion of her lover she barred the door and hastened to her grandmother.

"You've been very long in barring the door," said the old woman, as she closed her huge ledger, which was to her what a Bible should have been. "I thought I heard the voice of that impudent young carpenter, Walter Brandon."

"Please, grandmother, let me have a light," said Leonora, who trembled at the thought of spending that night in darkness.

"A light!" screamed Dame Ursula, astonished at such extravagance, "away with you; you will be asking for something more to eat next."

That night as the clock in the hall struck 2 the dame was aroused from a golden dream by a sharp pain in her neck and a loud oath.

Springing from her bed, she shrieked for help, and, pursued by the assassin rushed into the hall. She gained a distant room in time to lock herself in At this instant her horrors were augmented by the report of a pistol, immediately followed by a shrill scream and then by another pistol shot, and ere the echo had died away the assassin burst the old door from its hinges and was in the room. The horror the dame endured as she crouched against the wall, praying that the darkness might shield her, curdled her blood in her veins. But suddenly the assassin sprung a light. At the sight of this man, instead of crouching in fear or screaming with terror, the dame sprang to her feet, saying:

"So it is you, John Bond, who have returned to murder your wife—coward!"

"Hag!" hissed the old man—yet he was much younger than she, "do you think because the devil lets you live so long that you are to live forever? Tell me where you have hidden your hoards, and those of your first husband, whom all men say you poisoned to marry John Bond."

"To tell you, I must leave this room," said Ursula, as her corpse-like visage grew livid with hate and despair.

"Whither, treacherous hag?"

"To the cellar, John Bond—come," and stepping boldly by him, she went on along the hall, lighted by the thief's lantern, which he carried.

"If I suspect treachery—if you cry for help—I will shoot you dead, Ursula Bond." Ursula led the way.

"Lift that trap, John Bond," said she, pointing to a heavy iron ring imbedded in the floor.

Ursula grasped the ring with both hands and strove to raise it, till, growing impatient, he grasped it himself and raised a trap door about three feet square. As he staggered with the weight Ursula fell against him and he fell headlong into the aperture, but as he fell he let fall his lantern and with his left hand grasped the edge of the trap. Ursula, ferocious with hate, stamped upon the clinging fingers, and as her feet were bare, making no impression upon the desperate clutch, she heaved at the trap door and let it fall upon the assassin's hand. Dame Ursula fell with a bullet in her brain across the trap.

The assassin fell to the bottom of a deep and narrow cellar, damp and dismal, and made more horrible by the rays shed by his lantern. The tide was rising in the bay—already the water was trickling through the stones of the foundation.

While Bond entered the house from the front, his accomplice, a brutal wretch from France, had gained a noiseless entrance from the rear. Had Walter been at his post this would not have happened, but poor Leonora, horrified at the thought of what might happen to her lover, had sought him instead of her couch.

Not until the sudden flash from the French burglar's lantern streamed across the room did Walter remember his self-imposed office, and as he sprang to his feet the burglar, turning to fly, was shot through the lungs. But as he fell he returned the shot, and Walter, with the thought that his skull was crushed, fell senseless. Poor Leonora had already swooned.

When Walter regained his senses, he found his sweetheart weeping and chafing his hands, and he was delighted to discover that the robber's bullet had only stunned him. The burglar was dead.

Not six months from that night Walter became the husband of the wealthy Leonora, who was sole heiress of Dame Ursula's wealth, much of which in gold was found secreted about the mansion. The year following, as Walter was directing the excavations for a new edifice where the old one had stood, his workmen discovered a lantern and near it a human skeleton.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Two Parliamentary Bulls.

The session of Parliament that recently ended was not particularly prolific of funny sayings, but there were a couple of good things unconsciously said. The first was by Mr. Field, M. P. He had made a statement at which Mr. Chamberlain shook his head, a silent negative. Mr. Field turned to Mr. Chamberlain and proclaimed:

"The right honorable gentleman shakes his head—I am sorry to hear it."

The second was from an Irishman. Mr. Flavin, M. P. He was about to put a question to a cabinet minister when the right honorable gentleman reminded Mr. Flavin that a letter had been sent to him (Mr. F.), asking him to postpone the question until such time as the minister could obtain the information needed before an answer could be given.

"Yes, sir," replied Mr. Flavin, "that is so. I have got that letter, and have not had time to open it."—Philadelphia Post.

Justice Waits for an Excursion.

"During the course of my career in the police department I have seldom come across anything more humorous than a letter recently received at the detective headquarters," said Captain of Detectives Lohrer yesterday. "We arrested a man wanted in a city not a hundred miles from here and we wired the marshal to come at once and get his prisoner. He wrote us a letter and said: "Please hold —— for one week. There is an excursion to Cleveland then and I can get cheap rates. Don't forget to hold him and see about a cheap ticket to here for my man."—Cleveland Leader.

FOOD EATEN BY FAMILY IN A YEAR

Amount Consumed by Man, Wife, and Two Daughters.

STATISTICS kept by a Chicago man show that during a year his family, consisting of himself, his wife and two daughters, consumed 4,047 pounds and thirty-eight varieties of food. The family lived under no economical restrictions, and their table was supplied as it has been daily for years with everything desired by any member of the family. For this reason the statistics, religiously kept and accurate to the ounce, have been pronounced highly valuable by students of food statistics and medical men generally, especially since the tables were kept in a casual manner, no influence being exerted either to augment or reduce the amount or variety of the daily menu to which the family had been accustomed.

The table in gross amounts is as follows:

Foodstuffs, in pounds	4,047
Eggs, in dozens	112
Oranges and lemons, in dozens	54
Milk, quarts	650
Berries, quarts	125
Apples, bushels	9

The foodstuffs, measured in pounds, are tabled as follows:

	Pounds.
Vegetables	1,200
Cereals	724
Meats	600
Poultry	220
Fish	180
Butter	187
Cheese	9
Grapes	340
Sugar	404
Coffee	43
Nuts	40
Preserved fruits	40
Lard	61
Total	4,047

As compared with the whole amount it is seen that 1,924 pounds of cereals and vegetables were consumed, while but 1,000 pounds of meats, poultry and fish were eaten, the nuts, fruits, eggs and milk not being considered, as they were regarded on the menu as but secondary foods. The proportion of vegetables and cereals may be regarded by some families as being excessive. There are, in fact, a large number of families who consider their tables well provided for that do not consume half this proportion of vegetables and cereals. The proportion, however, is regarded by statisticians as a normal one, and is classed thus by the man who kept the statistics, as at no time during the year was the proportion of vegetable foods on the table regarded as out of the ordinary.

The flour used during the year would make a loaf of bread so large it would take two men to carry it. If hollowed out it would make a two-story playhouse for half a dozen children and leave room for the dog. A chicken weighing 220 pounds, the amount of poultry used during the year, would be almost eight feet in height and according to estimate its cackle could be heard four times around a city block. Closely pressing the poultry in its amount is the item of fish. A fish weighing 180 pounds would be almost as large as the fish that always gets away.

The meat total would supply a small sized butcher shop for a considerable length of time, and the 650 quarts of milk would require a jar several times larger than the ordinary sized milk man. A flap jack made of the twenty-eight pounds of pancake flour would make a small sized dancing floor and the 1,344 eggs, if made into one large egg to be colored for Easter, would require four buckets of aniline dye for the work.

The 1,200 pounds of vegetables would make a New England boiled dinner large enough for two full regiments, the fruits would start a street stand of no mean dimensions, while the nine pounds of cheese, if turned loose, would exert, it is estimated, about forty horse power.—Chicago Tribune.

QUEER PHILIPPINE PRODUCT.

The Doerian Assails the Nostrils Violently but Enchants the Palate.

The doerian is a fruit. What it looks like would be impossible to convey to the thought, except by tinted pictures. Its appearance is of slight moment here, for even if the Philippines are annexed the fruit will never be seen in the American markets. It will not bear transportation, and if that difficulty could be obviated no quarantine officer would dare to allow a cargo of doerian to enter any port, its signs of dire contagion are so manifest. The unimportant question of what it most resembles may be passed over by saying that it never looks ripe and never looks fit to eat.

The first doerian which a newcomer encounters in Luzon, and, above all, at Iloilo, where they abound, does not long occupy the eye, for the nose is more violently assailed. When a doerian is in its best stage of ripeness its odor is such as to demonstrate how poverty-stricken the language is in terms descriptive of foul odors. How man ever discovered that this nauseating odor covers the most delicious of all fruits is a dense mystery. There is but one way to eat one's first doerian. Have simple faith and the utmost confidence in the integrity of the person who proffers the revolting delicacy. Then stand at a distance to windward while some immune breaks the fruit open for eating. Holding a tight grip upon the nostrils, rush upon the fruit, and pop a segment into the mouth. The moment the creamy pulp melts up on the tongue and finds its way back to the palate there is the victory won; the Philippines have peacefully conquered the invader. No fruit can rival its rich flavor as of strawberries and raspberries mixed with violets and delicate rose leaves. Of all the products of nature it is the most delicious. The first mouthful is all that is needed; the nauseating odor is passed and done forever; years may elapse between the eating of two doerians, but the disgusting stench will never again be perceived. The plant, though now abundant in the Philippines, is believed to be indigenous to Sumatra. There at least they endow it with magic power to call the wanderer home, for the islanders often repeat the proverb, "Who has eaten doerian will eat doerian."

A PSYCHIC PHENOMENON.

In This Case No Heed Was Paid to the Warnings.

"Speaking of superstitions and strange warnings that come to people," said a veteran Washington correspondent, "I had an experience once that I hardly know how to account for. I may say in advance that I don't believe in any of the business that cannot be demonstrated scientifically. One day, not a great while after the present elevator to the House press gallery had been put in, my mother sent for me to stop at her house on my way down town, as she had something particular to see me about. I went, and she asked me if there wasn't a new elevator to the press gallery. I told her one had been put in three or four months before that. She said that was it, and that I must not ride in it, for she had dreamed the night before that I had been crushed to death in it. I laughed at her, of course, and went on my way. Down on F street I met an aunt who told me she had something odd to tell me. She said she had been the day before, with a niece of her husband, to see a fortune teller, as the niece had taken a fancy to see one of those fakirs. The fortune teller, however, instead of telling the niece anything, had directed her remarks to her (my aunt) and had told her that she had a relative, a young man, whom she should warn, as he would be crushed to death in an elevator. That was rather a jar to me, as I was her only young man relative, and as I had so shortly before been warned by my mother. However, I laughed at her also and went on my way to the Capitol.

"I went about the committee rooms awhile, and at last, quite forgetful of my late warnings, went to the elevator to go up to the gallery. The elevator man, an old fellow whom I had known for some time, was in the cage when I got there, and before opening it he talked to me through the bars.

"'I don't know,' said he, 'whether I ought to let you come in here or not.'

"'Why not?' I inquired, laughing.

"'Because,' said he, as serious as could be, 'I dreamed last night that I had run the elevator up too high and that as you started to get in you slipped some way under it, and when I got down to you at the bottom of the shaft you were smashed to death.'

"This looked like the 'fatal three warnings,' and I confess I had a few doubts myself, but I had some nerve left, and I jollied him on his notion and got in. On my way up I told him what my mother and my aunt had told me, and the old fellow was so scared that he hardly knew what to do, but I got through all right, and up to date I have not been crushed in that elevator or any other, but, of course, that's no sign I won't be, and if I ever am, the cranks will be sure to hold me up as a frightful example. I suppose there are some people who wouldn't ride in that elevator for all kinds of money, and still they may fall down stairs at any moment and break their necks."—Washington Star.

CHILDREN'S MEMORIES LONG.

Parents Should Be Careful What They Say Before the Little Ones.

That the mind of a child is easily impressed was demonstrated recently, when a 3-year-old son of a well-known South-Sider spoke of a foolish remark that had been made by his father more than a week before and which had been forgotten by all who heard it except little Raymond, who, it should have been expected, would be the first to forget what he had heard.

The family was seated at dinner several weeks ago, and after the father had lighted his cigar he said that he did not feel well and the mother jokingly said that she hoped he was not getting ready to die. Then the father asked her what she would do if he should die, and before she had time to answer he told her that he wanted her to forget him after he was dead.

The conversation drifted to other subjects, and all who heard the advice of the father forgot it long before they retired that night, but it developed later that for little 3-year-old Raymond it was not so easy to forget what he had heard his father say.

More than a week after the father had made the joking remark the mother and her little son were alone at dinner, as the father had been detained at his office. Just before they were ready to leave the table Raymond toddled across to his mother, and standing at her side he said:

"Mamma, will you fordit pappa?"

"No, dear; of course, mamma won't forget papa. Why do you ask me such a question?" answered the astonished mother.

"Pappa tole us to fordit him."

"No, papa didn't tell us to forget him, Raymond."

By this time tears were glistening in the child's eyes, and he finally burst into pitiful weeping. The mother could not understand what it all meant. Suddenly Raymond raised his head from her lap, and looking her in the face he said:

"Mamma, I know you will fordit pappa when he's dead, but I won't. I'll love him more'n I do now."

Then the mother asked the little weeping child what he was talking about, and between his sobs he reminded her that his father had told them to forget him after he was dead. The father got a good lecture from his wife that night, and he will never again jest about dying.—Chicago Chronicle.

Ancient Deed in Philadelphia.

The first deed conveying property to the proprietor of Pennsylvania, William Penn, is written in old Dutch, and is now preserved in the City Hall. The property was what is now known as Lemon Hill, including the mansion and the Schuylkill River front, where the old Fairmount waterworks was located. There Penn kept his barge and some rowboats, the barge carrying an admiral's pennant. It is said there is only one man in Philadelphia who can read this deed.

When a Child Dies in Greenland.

When a child dies in Greenland the natives bury a live dog with it, the dog to be used by the child as a guide to the other world. When questioned with regard to his peculiar superstition, they will only answer, "A dog can find his way anywhere."

When a man is having a particularly hard time his kin like to hunt him up and tell him to try and be "patient a little longer."

INDUSTRIES OF CUBA.

AGRICULTURAL HISTORY OF THE ISLAND REVIEWED.

Land Owners, Formerly Cattle Grazers, Are Now Successful Planters—Fruits and Vegetables Are Fine—Sugar and Tobacco.

Agriculture, which is the main industry of Cuba, has been given the most careful attention in the United States census report, which has but recently been issued. There are several chapters in the bulky volume which have been devoted to the subject of agriculture with interesting and valuable results. Special schedules were prepared for the taking of census statistics from the plantations. Even so the greatest difficulty was experienced in procuring accurate statements, since the majority of the farms had been abandoned throughout the war and were still unsettled. Traveling over miles of rough country the census enumerators found everywhere devastation and ruined homes, still deserted and uncared for. Tending to complicate matters also was the fact that many of the plantations had been divided into small patches of ground in order to avoid the taxes levied even on the smallest subdivision of ground at the rate of $5. The majority of the tenants resulting were but of temporary residence and were able to give almost no information concerning the land and its productiveness. The schedules which were after much work returned therefore are somewhat defective. Previous to the last war there were in Cuba 90,960 plantations, farms, orchards and cattle ranges, which were valued at 220,000,000 pesos, or about $200,000,000. The only manufactories were those producing cigars and the sugar mills producing raw sugar, molasses and rum.

CUBAN NATIVES AND PLANTATION EQUIPMENT.

Cattle-Raising Formerly General.

In the early days of the island cattle-raising was the principal industry, agriculture being very generally disregarded. The land was held in great open ranges, privately owned but unfenced and almost unguarded, like one great wild country. The chief agricultural products of Cuba are now tobacco and sugar, with some fruit-raising, which of late years has depreciated owing to the almost universal fruit-growing of California. At present there is scarcely more coffee raised than is required for hom use, although the soil and climate of the eastern provinces are particularly adapted to coffee-raising, and it is believed that the industry will again be revived. It is likewise believed that the growth of fruit for exportation will receive a new stimulus and that Cuba will rival California in the raising of limes, lemons, oranges, olives, pineapples and many other fruits and vegetables. Oranges will grow in any part of the island and are unrivaled for their delicacy of flavor and amount of juice. The largest of the banana farms are in Porto Principe and Santiago, from where they were shipped in large quantities to the United States before the war. The growing and preparation of sugar and tobacco for the foreign market are the largest and richest of Cuba's industries.

AGRICULTURE IN CUBA.

Statistics for the years from 1893 to 1899 for the production of sugar are as follows:

1893	815,894	1896	225,221
1894	1,054,214	1897	212,051
1895	1,004,264	1898	300,000

The report contiues: "We could have ground that year more than 1,100,000 tons of sugar had it not been for the war."

United States the Main Market.

Statistics showing the distribution of the crop for the year 1897 is a fair estimate of all preceding years. They are as follows:

	*Tons.
Crop of 1897	212,051
Exported to the United States	202,703
Exported to Nassau	83
Exported to Spain	1,337
Local consumption, whole year	38,000

Tons of 2,240 pounds.

For many years the tobacco trade of Cuba was a crown monopoly, with a royal office and warehouse at Havana and branch houses throughout the provinces. In these storehouses the planters could store their tobacco, receiving such prices as might be established by the crown for each crop. In later years the tobacco monopoly was sold to private companies and was again resumed by the crown in 1760. Finally in 1817 by a royal decree the trade and cultivation of tobacco were declared free on payment of a tax by each planter equivalent to one-twentieth of the product. Since that date the taxes have varied, but have usually been very high.

The average production of tobacco, in bales, in 1894-5 was in the neighborhood of 560,000 bales of fifty kilos, or 62,000,000 pounds of leaf, valued at $22,000,000. Of this amount nearly 40 per cent was retained for home consumption and used in the manufacture of cigars and cigarettes, and this is about the proportion with normal crops.

Since 1895 the crop has been as follows:

1897	375,000	1899	220,000
1898	88,000	1900	460,000

The amount of the exports to the United States during those years is thus given:

	Pounds.	Value.
1897	4,410,073	$2,306,067
1898	4,691,456	4,333,078
1899	8,102,974	6,916,360
1900	11,815,451	9,704,331

Except for cigars and cigarettes the numerous forms in which tobacco is used are not manufactured in Cuba. Tobacco is raised as an article of commerce in but four of the six provinces of Cuba, Pinar del Rio, Habana, Santa Clara and Santiago de Cuba, although there is no question but that it could be advantageously raised in the other two.

One of the industries which is now practically dead, but which was formerly the source of wealth and fame to the island, is coffee raising. It is one of the industries for which a great future is promised, since it is known that for richness, flavor and the productive capacity of the trees the coffee of Cuba is not surpassed by that of any other West India island or by South America.

History of Coffee Production.

In the years 1843 and 1846 violent hurricanes visited Cuba and seriously damaged the coffee crop. Owing to these disasters the increased coffee trade of the East Indies and South America and the larger and more certain profits of sugar cultivation, the coffee industry of Cuba rapidly declined and by 1850 the amount exported was but 192,060 arrobas. The coffee plantations were converted to other uses and the trade in coffee practically disappeared. The world's estimated coffee crop of 1900 is 15,285,000 bags of 134¼ pounds each. Of this amount Cuba is credited with 130,000 bags, not enough for home consumption. A consideration of these facts may result in the revival of this important industry, which, under free institutions, it is believed will regain its former position among the agricultural resources of Cuba.

The raising of stock, which used to be one of the important resources of the country, is no longer of any importance, excessive taxes having driven the landowners into other branches of farm production. There are, however, few better countries for stock-raising than Cuba and future promises are bright for those who again undertake it.

A Quaint London Custom.

It is curious how few persons have noticed the ancient and quaint custom which is observed every evening during term in the walks of the Middle Temple of sounding the call that warns members of the inn that it is time to dress for dinner in the hall at six. The custom is as old as the Middle Temple itself, where it alone exists.

At about five-thirty p. m. the warder on duty emerges from a side door of the hall with an old-fashioned cow horn, richly ornamented with silver, and, commencing in Fountain court, blows a sustained blast on it, which he repeats in New court, Essex court, Brick court, Pump court, Elm court and at the entrance to Crown Office row. The whole operation lasts about ten minutes, and when it is over the warder, who is a kind of beadle in plain livery, returns the horn to the butler's pantry.

Nobody seems to take any notice of the horn blowing except small boys and ticket porters, who occasionally chaff the warder while he is engaged in his musical efforts.

LOW GRADE ORES IN CALIFORNIA.

It has been frequently stated in Eastern publicatians devoted to mining that California is a mineralized region whose chief characteristics are low-grade ores. This is only partly true. A few years ago only veins carrying a moderately high grade of ore could be worked profitably, hence the low-grade ore bodies were untouched. Since it has been proved, however, that through later processess and methods low-grade ores, where accessible in large bodies, can be handled at a profit, these deposits have been coming into favor. Some of these low-grade properties are yielding as good returns as many with ores of a higher grade, because of the greater volume of material handled by the appliances employed in reduction. Take, for example, the three northern counties of Trinity, Shasta and Siskiyou. Each one contains many veins carrying high-grade gold ore. These are usually narrow and the quantity of ore that can be stoped is limited. Until a few years ago nearly all the gold production of Siskiyou and Shasta was obtained from these narrow high-grade ledges. Most of Trinity county's contribution to the State's annual gold production has been coming and still comes from the placers, as it is one of the few sections of the State where hydraulic mining can be prosecuted without running afoul of the anti-debris decision. But of late years the great masses of low-grade mineralized ore bodies scattered all over these three counties have been claiming attention. They contain only a small quantity of gold in combination with base metals, and for the gold that is in them alone they might never be made to pay. But the working of these low-grade veins as base metal propositions, the auriferous contents being treated as a by-product, is productive of the best results. The greatest advance made in mining in these three counties in the last few years has been in the opening up of this class of properties. The promise of the future lies in the same direction. There are other sections of the State where a similar movement in mining development is discernable.

This is one of the most prominent features in the mining industry, because it is broadening the field of human employment as well as adding steadily to the world's wealth from a source which was until comparatively recently regarded as incapable of being rendered profitably productive. These low-grade ores have called in the aid of the smelter, and now we have several mammoth plants, some in operation and others under construction, which are giving employment to hundreds of men to feed their fires and to hundreds of skilled miners to keep them supplied with ores. Fortunately, these masses of low-grade ore bodies are widely distributed through the State and are apparently inexhaustible. Their development is, therefore, not a flash in the pan, as it were; but something that has come to stay. The high-grade ore bodies will continue to be heard from hereafter, as they have in the past; but the low-grade deposits will in time take the lead in the State as wealth producers. —San Francisco Chronicle.

STEWART'S MINING BILL.

The text of Senator Stewart's bill to amend the mining laws of the United States discloses one of the most radical mining measures proposed in Congress for many years. It is not yet law, but doubtless will and ought to become so:

The bill provides as follows:

That no person shall locate a mining claim as agent or by power of attorney for another, except as hereinafter provided. No person shall locate more than one placer mining claim in the watershed of any stream or creek in the same mining district, nor shall any person locate more than one claim on any vein or lode; provided that any citizen of the United States or person who shall have declared his intention to become such, may, after the discovery of ore in place in a lode or mineral vein in paying quantities in a placer deposit, locate one such claim for one other person as agent or attorney and no more in any one mining district; provided further, that prior to any such location for another he shall file for record in the Recorder's office of the mining disirict a power of attorney authorizing him to make mining locations for the person named therein, which power of attorney must be acknowledged before a notary public or other person having a seal and authorized by law to take acknowledgments of deed, and, provided further, that the person for whose benefit the location is made shall be a citizen of the United States or shall have declared his intention to become such, and shall within six months after such location file his acceptance of the same, acknowledged in the same manner as the power of attorney aforesaid, with the recorder of mining claims in the district where mining claims are recorded, and shall perform the amount of labor and improvements required within the time prescribed by law.

Sec. 2. That on all mining claims located as provided in Section 1 of this Act the assessment work required by law shall be performed on or before the 31st day of December following the date of location, except that on claims located after the 1st day of September in any year the time within which the said assessment work shall be performed may be extended to and including the 31st day of December of the following year, and no person shall relocate, either by himself or by agent any claim upon which he has failed to perform the said assessment work.

FAREWELL TO P. A CHALFANT.

In his home at Bishop, California, February 1st, 1901, Pleasant Arthur Chalfant died, a little over three score and ten allotment of years having been his life. It was an eventful one, from which lessons may be drawn.

He was born at Chillicothe, Ohio, his parents being Quakers of pioneer record in that State. From thence, down the Ohio, a few years of his early boyhood were passed upon the Mississipi river at Keokuk, Iowa. Later, at Iowa City, on the Iowa river, he broke away from a printing. office to join one of the first large trains to cross the plains to California and reached a land of gold on Feather river "in the spring of '49." He participated in all the early excitements from Central California to Frazer.

His was the life of all others of those days, rosy in success or blue in failure. But the Argonauts have always said that if there was any conceivable gleam of fun in distrait of privation or loss by fire or flood "Chal" was the man to find it. With his violin he played "Arkansaw Traveler" while the laborious accumulation, the everything in sight, of himself and partners was being destroyed. But he saved the viclin, and they all went to work again.

In 1865 Mr. Chalfant left Solano county for Boise river, Idaho, where he met and married his noble wife, whose grief is now so profoundly sympathized with by all. They came from Idaho to Owens river, and in July 1870, deceased became the pioneer patriarch of local printing by the establishment of the INYO INDEPENDENT, with which he continued as senior and balance wheel for more than a decade. In '85 he founded the Inyo Register, in association with his son.

His writings as to early California life, on the plains, the tramp and in the diggings; his history of the ill-fated Death Valley party, with whom he started but left to guide himself alone by the northern route; his reminiscences of the unfortunate Donner party and many other noted events, have been given to the public in these and other papers in his own clear words, with deft concealment of his own good deeds.

Mention of his genius as a craftsman may be made by stating the fact that he contributed to the printing trade without expectancy of reward the first automatic mailing machine, a device for stamping addresses of subscribers to newspapers. There are now very few newspapers that do not employ the principle of the invention for the purpose. Through fire last spring a working, patented machine of his invention was destroyed; it was a complex affair, accomplishing the wrapping of papers direct from the folding machinery.

In 1886 he was elected Assessor of this county and through re-elections served the people in that responsible capacity for twelve years. In this work he was of course well known to all.

He became a Mason twenty-six years ago, and upon his death Winnedumah Lodge, No. 287, lost one of its main organizers and a Past Master. At the sad obsequies on Sunday last he was buried with all the public honors of the order. In the services a just teacher of religion paid tribute to the ending of an honorable life. Words can but faintly express the esteem in which he was held or describe sorrow of the community or sympathy with his family.

A good man has crossed the last river.

A vein of ore over six feet wide has been struck in the O Be Joyful mine in Tuba canyon that gives an average assay sample of $160 per ton in gold.

George Montgomery came in from the Eclipse mine on Monday last. He reports the work of sinking the shaft as being prosecuted vigorously.

C. J. Johnson, representing Folger & Co., and E. Springstein, representing Miller, Slosson, Scott, have been interviewing our merchants during the week.

The Rebekahs are planning a Valentine party to given at their hall. One of the features of the evening will be a post-office where guests may bring valentines for distribution.

Mrs. D. J. Hession and family, after a visit of six weeks to relatives in Big Pine, returned to their home here on Sunday last. Miss Mamie, who was quite ill when they left, is greatly improved in health.

E. T. Anderson, of Barnes & Anderson, came in from the mine Tuesday and returned Wednesday. He reports the mines as looking well and the mill running nicely. Last week they shipped a bar of bullion valued at over $1300.

Since it is certain that the Los Angeles and Salt Lake railroad will be built a great deal of attention has turned to southern Nevada, which is sure to experience a mining boom and extensive development. That is a rich mineral region in which progress has so far been small on account of the lack of railroad facilities and the generally prohibitive cost of transportation. This railroad will give a mining impetus to a vast stretch of mineral territory in California, Nevada, and Utah.

The Randsburg Miner says: Mr. James Davis, Industrial Commissioner of the Santa Fe System, and William C. Potter, Mining Engineer and Mineral Examiner for the road, who have been traveling in the Panamint country, going up as far as Darwin, in company with Mr. E. H. Stagg, General Manager of the Randsburg Road, returned Monday very well pleased with the outlook for business in that direction. Just what report they will make to their company we do not know, but on that report will depend largely the future extension of the Randsburg railway.

C. A. Hallowell, representing the Studebaker Co., was in town Wednesday night.

W. F. Holland, of Washington, D. C., special Indian agent, was here Wednesday night.

An Invitation to Women

All the world knows of the wonderful cures which have been made by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, yet some women do not realize that all that is claimed for it is absolutely true.

If all suffering women could be made to believe that Mrs. Pinkham can do all she says she can, their suffering would be at an end, for they would at once profit by her advice and be cured.

There is no more puzzling thing than that women will suffer great pain month after month when every woman knows of some woman whom Mrs. Pinkham has helped, as the letters from grateful women are constantly being published at their own request.

The same derangements which make painful or irregular periods with dull backaches and headaches, and dragging-down sensations, presently develop into those serious inflammations of the feminine organs which completely wreck health.

Mrs. Pinkham invites women to write freely and confidentially to her about their health and get the benefit of her great experience with the sufferings of women. No living person can advise you so well. No remedy in the world has the magnificent record of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound for absolute cures of female ills. Mrs. Pinkham's address is Lynn, Mass.

Three Letters from One Woman, Showing how She Sought Mrs. Pinkham's Aid, and was cured of Suppression of the Menses and Inflammation of the Ovaries.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I have been in bed a year. Doctors say I have female weakness. I have a bad discharge and much soreness across my ovaries, bearing-down pains and have not menstruated for a year. Doctors say the menses will never appear again. Hope to hear from you."—MRS. J. F. BROWN, Holton, Kans., April 1, 1898.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I received your letter. I have taken one bottle and a half of your Vegetable Compound, and used two packages of your Wash, and feel stronger and better. I can walk a few steps, but could not before taking your Compound. I still have the discharge and am sore across the ovaries, but not so bad. Every one thinks I look better since taking your Vegetable Compound."—MRS. J. F. BROWN, Holton, Kans., Aug. 13, 1898.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I think it is my duty to let you know the good that Lydia E. Pinkham's Compound has done me. After I took three bottles, menses appeared, and I began to feel stronger and all my pain was gone. Yours is the only medicine that ever helped me. I am able now to work around the house, something I did not expect to do again."—MRS. J. F. BROWN, Holton, Kans., Jan. 25, 1899.

Three More Letters from One Woman, Relating how She was Cured of Irregular Menstruation, Leucorrhœa and Backache.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I am suffering and need your aid. I have pains in both sides of the womb and a dragging sensation in the groin. Menstruation irregular and painful; have leucorrhœa, bearing-down pains, soreness and swelling of the abdomen, headache, backache; nervousness, and can neither eat nor sleep."—MRS. CARRIE PHILLIPS, Anna, Ill., July 19, 1897.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I want to thank you for what you have done for me. When I wrote to you I was a total wreck. Since taking your Vegetable Compound, Liver Pills and Sanative Wash, my nerves are stronger and more steady than ever before, and my backache and those terrible pains are gone. Before I took your medicine I weighed less than one hundred and thirty pounds. I now weigh one hundred and fifty-five pounds. Your medicine is a godsend to poor weak women. I would like to ask you why I cannot have a child. I have been married nearly three years."—MRS. CARRIE PHILLIPS, Anna, Ill., Dec. 1, 1897.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—I did just as you advised me, and now I am the happy mother of a fine baby girl. I believe I never would have had her without your Vegetable Compound."—MRS. CARRIE PHILLIPS, Anna, Ill., Jan. 27, 1899.

Proof that Falling of the Womb is Overcome by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—When I wrote to you some time ago, I had been suffering from falling of the womb for many years without obtaining relief. Was obliged to wear a bandage all the time; also had bad headache and backache, felt tired and worn out. After taking six bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and four boxes of Liver Pills, I discarded my bandage and have not had to wear it since. I am entirely cured."—MRS. J. P. TROUTMAN, Box 44, Hamilton, Ohio.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—For nearly two years I was unable to work. I was very weak and could not stand on my feet but a few minutes at a time. The doctors said I had falling and inflammation of the womb. I began to use Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and after using five bottles I feel like a new woman."—MRS. P. N. BLAKE, Confluence, W. Va.

What Was Wanted.

ON BACK OF A BULL.

FRIGHTFUL TORTURE INFLICTED BY INDIANS.

A White Man and Woman Tied Onto the Terrified Animal, Which Was Then Turned Loose—They Were Pursued by Wolves but Rescued.

In striking contrast to the exciting experiences he underwent in his younger days is the quiet manner in which Capt. Ike Jackson, whose name is familiar all through the Southwest, is passing the evening of his life. Now he lives on his well-stocked ranch on the Pecos River in Western Texas, and, while a jolly, sociable companion, under all conditions, is at his best while recalling the incidents of his life on the frontier when the Indians were plentiful. His entertaining fund of reminiscences he is always ready to draw upon and never does he talk to an uninterested audience. One of his tales is of an exciting event which led to his marriage. As he tells it, the story is as follows:

Attacked by Indians.

"I was playing the fiddle one night at a dance in a little log cabin on the extreme frontier. There had been rumors of an Indian raid, but the people were fearless, and everybody in the neighborhood was at the dance. Suddenly an arrow whizzed through the open door and struck a young girl on the shoulder. It was followed by a shower of arrows and a few shots. Women shrieked, and the men seized their arms and began to barricade the house. I kept on playing the fiddle as if nothing had happened.

"'That's right, Ike,' whispered old Colonel Chrisman. 'Play as if the devil was after you and I will save the women and children.' I turned loose on 'The Arkansas Traveler' and I made the old fiddle roar. While some of the boys were popping away in the dark from the front of the cabin the old colonel managed to slip out the back way and escape into the woods with the women and children. Then I laid the fiddle down and got my gun and joined in the defense. The red devils were too many for us, and after killing four of our boys they set fire to the cabin and succeeded in capturing me as I was trying to cut my way through their lines with my bowie knife.

"They bound me hand and foot and tied me to a pony. After raiding the settlement and burning the cabins they started back toward a Lipan village on Devil River. When daylight came I was congratulating myself that the red men had not captured any of the wives or daughters of the settlers, but in a moment I heard a cry of distress and upon twisting my head around was amazed to see a beautiful young girl whom I well knew lashed to an old squaw who was riding a mustang. The Indians had found a demijohn of brandy in a cabin and it was not long before several of the warriors were drunk. They began to yell and cavort about on their ponies apparently indifferent to the likelihood that they might be overtaken at any moment by the enraged settlers. While crossing the San Gabriel prairie they circled around a herd of wild cattle and roped several of the fat animals. By this time the old chief in command was almost too drunk to ride, and they halted in a grove on the banks of San Gabriel and prepared to have a feast. We were tied to a tree, and the old squaw told us that we would be burned alive later in the day. The girl was the daughter of Colonel Munroe, a noted member of Austin's colony. I was close enough to speak to her, and I bade her to be of good cheer, telling her that our friends would be sure to rescue us soon. The Indians feasted and drank until nearly sunset, and by that time many of the warriors were furiously drunk and eager for some fiendish work. They roped a monster Mexican bull, and the old squaw said to the girl 'White face heap fraid of bull. No like to ride him?'

Lashed Onto the Bull.

"The savages no sooner heard this remark than they began to yell with delight. They ran toward the girl, and three or four drunken warriors seized and dragged her to the bull. Other Indions cut me loose from the tree and forced me along by the side of the terrified girl. They threw us on the back of the bellowing beast, and lashed us securely to his body.

"By this time the whole camp was aroused and eager to witness the tortures. Squaws clapped their hands, and the drunken warriors howled like incarnate devils. They cut the bull loose with us lashed to his back, and he sprang away bellowing, with blood and foam flying from his nostrils. The Indians set out after the maddened beast, raining arrows and musket balls at us. The girl swooned with terror, and I abandoned all hope. Fortunately it was late in the evening, and the frightened bull ran so fast that the drunken Indians soon lost sight of him. When I realized this all my energy and courage returned to me and I determined to make a desperate effort to save my own and the girl's life. I called Sallie and was glad to find that she had recovered her senses. Tugging with all my strength at the ropes I managed to get one hand loose. At this moment a new terror sprang up. The bull had been wounded and he was leaving a trail of blood that had been scented by a pack of wolves. The hungry beasts howled and yelped as if there were a thousand of them, and it was not long before I could hear them gnashing their teeth.

Rescued from a New Danger.

"It is likely that the bull would have fallen on the prairie from exhaustion and the wolves would have devoured us before we could have released ourselves had it not been that the bull had run back directly over the trail the Indians had made. Animal instinct led him back to the locality from which he had been taken, and he ran right into a column of settlers who were pursuing the Indians. Sallie saw the horsemen and when she began to scream her father, who was in command of the pursuing party, recognized her voice. The bull, being nearly exhausted, was easily captured.

"I don't think that I told Sallie that I loved her while we were on the back of that bull, but I did fall in love with her while the arrows were falling about us. Not long after we were married."

THEY CUT THE BULL LOOSE WITH US LASHED TO HIS BACK.

ORIGIN OF LONDON BRIDGE.

Its Buildings Traced to the Handiwork of Roman Engineers.

When was the bridge built? It is impossible to say. It was not there A. D. 61, when Queen Boadicea's troops sacked the city, and murdered the people. It was there when Allectus led his troops out to fight the Roman legions. It was there very early in the Roman occupation, as is proved by the quantity of Roman coins of the four centuries of their tenure found in the bed of the river on the side of the old bridge. It is also proved by the fact that Southwark was a settlement of the wealthier class, who could not have lived in a place absolutely without supplies, had there been no bridge. We may take any time we please for the construction of the bridge, so long as it is quite early—say, before the second century.

The Britons themselves were quite unable to construct a bridge of any kind unless in the primitive methods observed at Post Bridge and Two Bridges, on Dartmoor, by a slab of stone laid across two bowlders. The work, therefore, was certainly undertaken by Roman engineers. We have, in the next place, to inquire what kind of bridge was built at that time by the Romans. They built bridges of wood and stone; many of these stone bridges still remain, in other cases the pieces of hewn stone still remain. The bridge over the Thames, however, was of wood. This is proved by the fact that had it been of the solid Roman construction in stone, the piers would be still remaining; also by the fact that London had to be contented with a wooden bridge till the year 1176, when the first bridge of stone was commenced. Considerations as to the comparative insignificance of London in the first century, as to the absence of stone in the neighborhood, and as to the plentiful supply of the best wood in the world from the forests north of the city, confirm the theory that the bridge was built of wood. We have only, therefore, to learn how Roman engineers built bridges of wood elsewhere in order to know how they built a bridge of wood over the Thames.—Pall Mall Magazine.

Centenarians Are Generally Small.

One of the most interesting and trustworthy statements in respect to old age is the report on the habits of centenarians, made some years ago by a commission appointed by the British Medical Association. It seems that most of these old people were small or medium of stature and a spare habit of body; the voice was rather feeble; most of them had lost their teeth, but nearly all enjoyed good digestion, one old man of 98, a clergyman, placing his hand on the organ in question and saying that he never knew what it was to have a stomach. Nearly all of them had enjoyed uninterrupted good health, and many had never known what it was to be sick. They were all very moderate in eating, most of them using little animal food. Few indulged at all in intoxicating drinks, and those only in notable moderation. They took considerable out-door exercise, and nearly all possessed the good-natured, placid disposition.

Are They Married?

In the village of Dalton Ledale, near Sunderland, England, 300 couples want to know whether they are married or not. For years they have thought they were, but the bishop of Durham declares they are not. They say the matrimonial knot was tied for a fee, and if it were not regularly done they assert that the bishop ought to have it repeated free.

Bicycles for French Postmen.

The French Postmaster General has found the use of bicycles for postmen so satisfactory that orders have been given for rural postmen, where possible, to be supplied with machines, to be paid for and kept in order by the state.

Vibration.

"Vibration is the great bugbear of this business," said one of the best informed stationary engineers in New Orleans. "It is governed by fixed laws, of course, but they are so subtle and intricate that it is next to impossible to master them. They have a most important bearing, however, on the life of machinery. I have known valuable engines to jar themselves literally to pieces for no apparent cause. Some slight error in adjustment had set up a vibration that was communicated from part to part, like a contagious disease, until the whole plant was affected.

"A steady tremor of that kind will not only wear out the parts, but it causes what we call 'structural changes' in the metal itself. Wrought steel will gradually lose its toughness and elasticity and become as brittle as cast iron. When it is fractured, the interior will have a strange, granulated appearance, and the worst of it is that the alteration may be going on for months without the knowledge of the most careful engineer alive. That is the secret of the breaking of a great many propeller shafts at sea.

"There are different ways of stopping vibrations, and one of the most curious is to set up a counter tremor in the opposite direction. One neutralizes the other."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Among the Advantages.

A pretty, highborn girl engaged herself to a young tradesman and never wavered in her determination to marry him despite the gloomy forecasts of her friends, who predicted lifelong misery for her.

"My child, do be advised," urged one of these well meaning ladies, calling to see the radiant bride on the very eve of the wedding. "I am an older woman than you and have seen more of the world, and it always makes me sad to hear of a nice girl marrying beneath her station. It is social suicide."

"Then from a social standpoint consider me dead," smiled the light hearted girl, "for I shall certainly marry Tom tomorrow. We reckoned up the situation long ago and found a whole host of advantages, but not a solitary thing could we discover to place on the disadvantage side."

"Then you couldn't have searched very far, my dear," said her counselor tartly. "Take my own case. Much as I love you, I shall be unable to visit you when you are married. Have you bargained for that?"

The bride blushed.

"Oh, yes, indeed," she answered hastily. "We put that down first of all."—London Telegraph.

In an article which he has written for The Youth's Companion, the Chief Signal Officer of the United States, Gen. A. W. Greely, gives some remarkable instances of the celerity with which news is communicated in the Arctic without the aid of post or telegraph.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that can not be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Charmed the Beast.

"Look at this handkerchief," said a young society man to his professional friend who has an office in the Porter building. "That bit of lace and ruffle is worth its weight in gold to me."

"Some connection with old associations—a mere sentiment, I suppose," suggested the professional man.

"Nothing of the kind. From a practical standpoint it is just as valuable as I describe it to be. A sentiment enters into the case, however."

"Well, tell us about it."

"The handkerchief, then, is the token by which I am permitted to enter the house where my sweetheart lives. Without it I should be torn to pieces by a huge bulldog there. The beast is as ferocious as a tiger. During the day he is kept in chains, but after 7 o'clock in the evening his mistress releases him in the yard. No stranger after that hour can enter the gate. The terrible animal was a menace to my suit until the lady hit upon the plan of giving me her handkerchief for use as a pass. Now when the dog rushes toward me I have only to toss the dainty token to him. He smells it and walks peacefully back to his kennel. Do you blame me for valuing it so highly?"—Memphis Scimitar.

The Twentieth Century.

We now stand at the threshold of the twentieth century, and the nineteenth is a thing of the past. It will, however, be known as the century of invention and discovery, and among some of the greatest of these, we can truthfully mention Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, the celebrated remedy for all ailments arising from a weak or disordered stomach, such as dyspepsia, indigestion, flatulency, constipation and biliousness.

A Settler.

A 5-year-old boy went with his mother to make a call. The lady of the house, who was fond of children, told him she meant to ask his mother to let her have him. "Don't you think your mother would let me buy you?" she asked.

"No, ma'am," answered the little fellow; "you haven't got money enough."

"How much would it take?" she continued.

"Three hundred dollars," said the boy promptly, as if that would settle the matter at once for all.

"Oh, well, then," said the woman, "I think I can manage it. If I can, will you come and stay with me?"

"No, ma'am," he said, with decision. "Mamma wouldn't sell me anybow. There are five of us, and mamma wouldn't like to break the set."—Buffalo Enquirer.

Demand For Excelsior.

The present annual production in this country of excelsior is about 60,000 tons. Put to a great variety of uses, excelsior is most commonly used for packing purposes, and in such uses it is employed for many very different kinds of things. It is used, for example, in the packing of things so fragile as eggs and things so solid as iron toys. In the various uses to which it is put excelsior is most in demand where manufacturing is carried on, so that the larger part of the great quantity of this material now produced in this country is used east of the Mississippi river.—New York Sun.

The Pleasures of Old Age.

No sane man would like to live his life over again. It is astonishing how the ordinary affairs of life seem to adapt themselves to your added years. One's pleasures are quieter, but quite as enjoyable. To live in the lives of your children, to watch their progress, the development of their minds, is one great source of pleasure. Then one has music, reading, gardening, etc. May I also add that I took the advice of an old friend some years ago who said the two things most likely to give pleasure in declining life were to learn whist and to play the violoncello?—A Man of Sixty in Spectator.

The House That Tresham Built.

One of the curiosities of architecture in England is, according to The Stone Trades Journal, the house erected about 300 years ago at Rushton, in Northamptonshire, by Sir Thomas Tresham, a Roman Catholic, who wished by his design to typify the Trinity.

The house is all threes, has three sides, three stories and three windows in each flat, each of them in the shape of the trefoil—the three leaved shamrock. Where the roofs meet rises a three sided pyramid, terminating in a large trefoil. The smoke escapes from this chimney by three round holes on each side of the three sides. The building is almost covered with mottoes and carvings, three Latin inscriptions, one on each of the three sides, having 33 letters in each. Three angles on each side bear shields. Over the door is the text from the Vulgate, "There are three that bear record." Inside the house each corner is cut off from each of the three main rooms, so that on every floor there are three three sided apartments.

Poison Oak Poison Ivy

are among the best known of the many dangerous wild plants and shrubs. To touch or handle them quickly produces swelling and inflammation with intense itching and burning of the skin. The eruption soon disappears, the sufferer hopes forever; but almost as soon as the little blisters and pustules appeared the poison had reached the blood, and will break out at regular intervals and each time in a more aggravated form. This poison will loiter in the system for years, and every atom of it must be forced out of the blood before you can expect a perfect, permanent cure.

SSS Nature's Antidote FOR Nature's Poisons, is the only cure for Poison Oak, Poison Ivy, and all noxious plants. It is composed exclusively of roots and herbs. Now is the time to get the poison out of your system, as delay makes your condition worse. Don't experiment longer with salves, washes and soaps—they never cure.

Mr. S. M. Marshall, bookkeeper of the Atlanta (Ga.) Gas Light Co., was poisoned with Poison Oak. He took Sulphur, Arsenic and various other drugs, and applied externally numerous lotions and salves with no benefit. At times the swelling and inflammation was so severe he was almost blind. For eight years the poison would break out every season. His condition was much improved after taking one bottle of S. S. S., and a few bottles cleared his blood of the poison, and all evidences of the disease disappeared.

People are often poisoned without knowing when or how. Explain your case fully to our physicians, and they will cheerfully give such information and advice as you require, without charge, and we will send at the same time an interesting book on Blood and Skin Diseases.

KILL THE GERMS!

Spread of Germs Through the Human System Instantly Checked by "5 DROPS."

"5 DROPS" is a germ killer; a preventive of disease; a builder of nerve force; a maker of pure blood; of healthy tissue. Where it is used there can be no disease. It is a natural foe to germ life. Left to themselves, without adequate measures of prevention, the germs which enter the weak human system multiply so rapidly that their numbers become beyond human comprehension, destroying the structures of the body until death comes to the victim's relief. "5 DROPS," if taken in time, is an absolute preventive of disease. It is the only absolute cure for Rheumatism, driving out of the system forever the uric acid and other impurities which cause it in its various forms. It is taken up at once by the blood. Hence its work is quicker, surer and many times more effective. You should never be without it. Secure a bottle today. You will then be on the safe side. "5 Drops" is harmless and can be used by a child as well as by an adult. It is used with unfailing effect in the following diseases: Rheumatism, Sciatica, Backache, Neuralgia, Gout, Dyspepsia, Asthma, Hay Fever, Catarrh, Croup, La Grippe, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Sleeplessness, Nervousness, Nervous and Neuralgic Headaches, Earache, Toothache, Heart Weakness, Paralysis, Creeping Numbness, Etc.

I WAS AT DEATH'S DOOR.

Gentleman: I want to tell you what your "5 Drops" has done for me. I was for two years a sufferer of untold misery. My feet were swollen so I could not wear shoes and my hands were drawn so I could not open them, nor could I shut them. They cramped half shut. My husband had me try every medicine he could hear of and I still suffered untold agonies. Nothing I could get would ease my pain, until last November one of my neighbors had Rheumatism so bad he could not walk. He told my husband about "5 Drops" curing him, so he got me a dollar bottle, and in three weeks I walked without a cane and could use my hands, something I had not done for two years. I give all the praise to "5 Drops." My neighbors know that I was at death's door. Now I have used four bottles of "5 Drops" and can do my work with ease. I am still taking it sometimes. If this will do any good toward getting suffering people to use "5 Drops," use this as you please. If any one doubts this, send them to my friends and neighbors. ELIZABETH C. FINN, 2057 North Lyon St., Springfield, Mo. Sept. 12, 1900.

THE FOUR WINDS.

Wind of the North,
Wind of the Norland snows,
Wind of the winnowed skies, and sharp, clear stars—
Blow cold and keen across the naked hills,
And crisp the lowland pools with crystal films,
And blur the casement squares with glittering ice,
But go not near my love.

Wind of the West,
Wind of the few, far clouds,
Wind of the gold and crimson sunset lands—
Blow fresh and pure across the peaks and plains,
And broaden the blue spaces of the heavens,
And sway the grasses and the mountain pines,
But let my dear one rest.

Wind of the East,
Wind of the sunrise seas,
Wind of the clinging mists and gray, harsh rains,
Blow moist and chill across the wastes of brine,
And shut the sun out, and the moon and stars,
And lash the boughs against the dripping eaves,
Yet keep thou from my love.

But thou, sweet wind!
Wind of the fragrant South,
Wind from the bowers of jasmine and of rose—
Over magnolia blooms and lilied lakes
And flowering forests come with dewy wings,
And stir the petals at her feet, and kiss
The low mound where she lies.

DRIFTWOOD.

"I'VE walked too far," she said wearily. "I'm tired." She sat down on a log at the edge of the wood and looked off at the lake. She was not in her first youth—Janet Long. Her eyes showed experiences and sorrow; yet in society she passed for a brilliant woman. Her critics accounted her somewhat too exclusive. But her critics were few in comparison with the number of her friends. This day, with the chilly autumnal wind announcing that the summer was at its close, she had walked into the woods with Elwin Walker, one of the men who had made up her brother's house party.

"I've been careless, Miss Long," he confessed. "I ought to have remembered that such a jaunt would wear you out. You look chilled, too."

"I'VE WALKED TOO FAR," SHE SAID, WEARILY.

"I am," she said. "I'm cold and—and lonely."

"You look as if you were—though for you to say that you are lonely is not, perhaps, much of a compliment to me."

"I didn't mean it for a compliment or a criticism. It's the truth."

He looked at her with a sudden flame coming into his eyes.

"If you are lonely," he cried, "it's your own fault. If you would let me——"

"The human soul is always lonely, I suppose," she replied. "But I'm stupid! Please forgive me. I said I was tired—but I was mistaken. I'm really cold. Come down to the beach and build a fire of driftwood."

He couldn't follow her mood—but that was nothing strange. She had baffled and perplexed him for a long time. She ran down the embankment like a girl, and began tugging great pieces of driftwood and broken branches of trees to one spot. He helped her, saying nothing, but noticing the grace of her tall, slender figure; the beauty of her tossing hair beneath her slouched gray hat; the insouciant gayety of her laughter, and her mood made her more charming to him than she had ever been before. They heaped the driftwood high and sat down before it together, and as the flames leaped up, surprising the dun sand and the gray water and sky, she fell to talking.

"Old ships, old wharves, old trees," she said musingly, looking into the heart of the fire.

"Old loves, old memories, old pains," he said, musingly, too.

"I can imagine the time when the ships sailed the lake triumphantly, and when the wharves were staunch and of much service to men, and the trees felt the sun and the wind in their branches," murmured Janet Long.

"I can remember when the love was full of hope, when there were more anticipations than memories, and when there was no pain," said Elwin Walker.

A silence fell between them. The lake made a melancholy murmur on the shore. The flames leaped and crackled. The wind stirred through the dead, coarse grasses in the sand.

"We'll be back in town presently," said Janet with a brisk reopening of conversation. "I shall have new gowns, and you'll make visits to your tailor. I'll see people, and hear music, and go dancing, and will repeat poetry at teas, and commit other sins."

"And I shall never see you except for a moment when you are talking airy nothings. I call on you at the opera for a moment, or troop in with a dozen others at your evenings. You'll have on all manners of furbelows—and they won't become you half so much as that roughing outfit you have on now. You'll pretend you are intellectual—and you know you aren't—particularly. You'll affect a heartless gayety—and you know you are neither heartless nor gay. I'm saying good-by to you to-day, as a matter of fact."

"You're saying good-by to my summer self. My winter self is far more improving."

"The flames are getting low. We might as well be going home."

"You are in a hurry."

"Yes, for if we stay here any longer I'll tell some things which I would rather not say."

"Say them."

"You have forbidden me to do so."

"But now I give you permission."

"You give me permission? You mean that I may tell you that my whole life is being embittered by your refusal to let me tell you how I love you? You realize that when I leave here to-morrow I leave all that makes life attractive or even endurable? My whole life has become centered in you. There is something haunting and subtle about your personality which has bound me as with an enchantment. You are the core of the world to me. It is mysterious, I confess. Why, out of millions of human beings should you be the only one who can give me joy? Why must I read a book with your eyes and listen to an opera with your ears, and care only for a beautiful morning because I think the radiance of it shines on you? I can't tell. But it is so."

She got up and heaped more pieces of the driftwood on the flame. Then she sat down by it again, folding her arms about her knees.

"I am not young," she said, "nor beautiful, nor gay, nor of the best courage. I am inclined to ask questions of life. If I were married I might be inclined to ask questions of love. I should be for saying: 'Is this the best that life can offer? Is this the ultimatum of love?'"

"I don't care how much you question," he answered, throwing himself forward in the sand so that he could look into her eyes, "if you will stay near me. If I can see you in my home, you may question as much as you please."

She looked down at him for a moment, and then her whole face changed, breaking into an expression of radiant joy.

"I believe I ought to be able to get as much out of life as any one else," she said. "The truth is, I love you. I love you—do you hear? But I was afraid to test my capacity for joy."

He put an arm about her with a tense clasp.

"Do not be afraid," he said. By the light of the flaming driftwood they saw joyful love each in the eyes of the other.—Chicago Tribune.

Chinese Ignorance.

R. E. Speer, in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly, says: "One of the delights of travel in China is the innocent ignorance of the people. They think themselves the most sophisticated and heaven-enlightened people on this earth, and so make their naive childishness the more engaging. They live very close to the primeval superstitions, and the gods and devils, between whom they make little practical distinction, command their healthy respect. Our slipper boat men stuck a bunch of incense sticks into the bank at the foot of some bad rapids, to placate the favor of the spirits of the rapids, who indeed was so far pleased as to let us ascend. Our house boat admiral laid out an elaborate offering of chicken and rice and soup and pork and chicken blood and lighted candles as we entered the North River on our downward journey. 'What is this for, captain?' we asked. 'For the enjoyment of the spirits of the river,' he replied; 'they are eating half the sacrifice.' 'But it is all here still,' we told him at the close. 'Well,' he replied, 'at least, the candles are gone.'"

Vigorous Measures.

For a long time the favorite form of "make believe" of little Faith was that of "getting married." For weeks she was a bride, marching down an imaginary aisle to the strains of an imaginary wedding march, to meet an imaginary bridegroom. At last, her mother becoming tired of it, she said:

"Faith, don't you know that when you get married you will have to leave me?"

This was a rude awakening, and the game stopped.

Not long afterward she came to ask the difference between "Miss" and "Mrs." To make herself clear her mother said:

"Well, when you grow up and become a young lady you will be Miss Butler; but if some man should ask you to marry him——"

"I'd call a policeman!" exclaimed Faith, and her interest was at an end.

It is probably safe to say, however, that in a dozen years from now the future "man" need not seriously consider the chances of arrest.

MADE A GREAT RUN.

Mrs. Grenfell Is Chosen Superintendent of the Colorado Schools.

Mrs. Helen Grenfell, the fusion candidate for superintendent of schools in Colorado, ran far ahead of her ticket at the recent election, and was chosen to the office. She is well qualified for the position and is universally admitted to be one of the most capable educators in the Centennial State.

Mrs. Grenfell is the incumbent of the office to which she has been re-elected, and the splendid run she made is a well-deserved tribute to her efficiency. Before her renomination, after a term of two years, the educators of the State, including the President of the State University and all the State institutions, regardless of party, signed a petition to Mrs. Grenfell to accept a renomination because of the value of her services to the educational interests of the State. This was a tribute never before paid to a superintendent of public instruction in Colorado. The renomination of an incumbent of this office has happened only two or three times before in the history of the State.

MRS. HELEN GRENFELL.

Mrs. Grenfell was a farmer's daughter in Boulder County, Colorado; then a teacher, then a county superintendent and, finally, a State superintendent, acknowledged to be the best Colorado ever had.

PICTURES ON HUMAN SKIN.

The Latest Parisian Fad Has Made Its Debut in This Country.

Not long after Dinkeresco, the noted Russian chemist, had discovered that it is possible to reproduce a photograph on the human skin it became quite a fad in Paris for love-sick men and women to have their dear one's lineaments stamped on the arm or shoulder. An English actress now playing in New York has brought the fad to this country and other members of the theatrical profession are being bitten by the Dinkeresco habit. The process is quite simple. The spot to be consecrated to displaying the features of a dear one is coated with a chemical mixture that is sensitive to the light. A flexible film of the loved one's features is placed on the mixture and you expose your arm for ten minutes and the picture is there. It must be washed with three different chemicals to assure permanency. After the triple bath it is impossible to remove the picture by any known process.

THE NEW FAD.

An Awful Question.

What would be the commercial effect of the certain knowledge that the world was coming to an end in fifty years? Well, the first effect would be rather social and moral than commercial, though, of course, it would react very strongly on the business world. Those who in the ordinary course of affairs would be dead before fifty years had passed would be the least affected, and younger people would probably become as resigned to universal death as they are now to the equally certain individual death. Therefore, at first there would be but little change. People would have to live and therefore they would have to work, while capitalists would have to keep their money invested; but as the last year of the world came nearer enterprise and industry would naturally slacken. It would be no use for parents to work for their children, or even for children to be educated for the life they would never live, and so the industrial fabric would gradually crumble away as men ceased to provide for a day that would never come. Commercial activity would probably give place to religious frenzy on the one hand and apathy or boundless license on the other. Under these circumstances the last few years of the world's life would be appalling beyond description.

The Boatswain's Judgment.

It was somewhere in this wide, wide world, just where has slipped my mind, and they were about to buy beef on hoof for the ships. So the officer whose duty is to make the purchase took ashore with him the boatswain, as representing the crew, to look over the animals and either object or not. They approached the first animal.

"How will that do?" asked the officer.

The boatswain cautiously approached the beast, bent down and gingerly ran his thumb and forefinger down first one shank and then the other, until the whole four shanks had been examined. Straightening up he said:

"He'll do all right, sir."

The officer flabbergasted, cried:

"But, dash it all, you can't tell the good points of a bullock by the shanks."

"Perhaps not, sir, but they're the only parts we ever gets, sir," was the reply.

Probably it is because the earth is round that so few people act on the square.

MAKE AN EXCELLENT DISH.

Sweet Potatoes Properly Cooked Are Very Palatable.

"I see that there is to be an exceptionally large crop of sweet potatoes this year," observed the Southerner in the party, "and I am sure that the news would be much more thrilling to New-Yorkers if they knew the proper way to prepare the vegetable. Now, I flatter myself that I do know, for the sweet potato is an appreciated vegetable in the South and the manner of cooking it has not been carelessly considered. I have never eaten sweet potatoes in any but one form since I tasted them first, and in that way they first become known to most Southerners, who indeed continue to eat them so during the most of their lives. The potatoes should be peeled and boiled until they are thoroughly but not too well cooked. Then they should be cut into four pieces lengthwise and placed in a tin baking pan. Butter and sugar should be placed over the potatoes abundantly before they are put in the oven to bake slowly. After a while the butter and sugar, mingling with the juice of the potatoes, forms a delicate crust that should be cooked until it has almost reached the point at which it is candy. Under this crust is a thick, rich syrup of the sap of the potatoes, sugar and butter. Anybody who has eaten sweet potatoes in this way will never be satisfied with any other way of cooking them. The principal merit of this method lies, of course, in having them thoroughly cooked. The fire must be slow and the cooking must continue until the sugar and butter on top of the potatoes have formed a crust.

"It is this unwillingness to cook things long enough that interferes with the success of many New York dishes. Take a boiled ham, for instance. Few of the boiled hams in New York are cooked. They are generally more or less raw in the center, merely because nobody is willing to take the necessary time to have them thoroughly boiled. One hotel in New York had for years a reputation for the ham served at its free lunch. It was good, but merely because it had been sufficiently cooked. The old rule, and the one that is followed in the South to-day, is to boil a ham one-half hour for every pound. Thus a ten-pound ham ought to be allowed to boil for five hours, and in that way the meat will be kept firm, dry and sweet throughout, instead of raw and wet in the center and cooked until it is as dry as a bone at the ends. That is the method of cooking that makes a ham in the South so very different from the kind New York eats."—New York Sun.

The labor organizations of Connecticut have united to secure legislation raising the factory age of children from 14 to 15 years.

The boot and shoe makers of New England are hard at work and are selling all the goods they can turn out. The industries generally are well employed.

There are 150 India rubber manufacturers in the United States, employing 15,000 operators, who produce 250,000 tons of goods valued at $250,000,000 per annum.

The Journeymen Brewers' National Union, according to a recent report of its Auditing Committee, has over $40,000 in its treasury, $37,000 of which is invested in gilt-edged securities.

One-fourth of the working people of Colorado are said to belong to labor organizations, and the State Federation of Labor claims that Colorado is the best organized State in the Union.

Label leagues are being rapidly organized in the principal cities and towns throughout Pennsylvania, and are creating an immense demand in that State for union-made goods.

The printers employed in the Government printing bureau at Ottawa, Ont., have had their wages raised from $12 to $13.50 per week, an increase of 12 per cent., through the efforts of the union of that city.

The Journeymen Bakers and Confectioners' International Union, nearly 50,000 strong, will make a general demand for a ten-hour day on May 1, 1901. Members are now working twelve to sixteen hours daily.

The United Association of Plumbers, Gas and Steam Fitters won forty strikes last year and lost thirteen. The officers attribute their success in a great measure to the healthy condition of the reserve and protection funds held by the subordinate unions.

In 1892 the finest labor temple in the world was built in Paris at a cost of $400,000. Eighty-two trades and organizations have meeting places and offices under the roof, for which a nominal rent is paid. The municipal council appropriates $10,000 annually for its maintenance.

A Marat Relic.

Literary Paris is greatly agitated over the difficulty of deciding which is the genuine copy of "L'Ami du Peuple," which was stained with the blood of Marat when the revolutionist met his death at the hands of Charlotte Corday. So far seven copies have turned up, all solemnly accredited and all bearing the blood stain.

VAST REGIONS OF THE EARTH AS YET UNEXPLORED BY WHITE MEN

IN an exhaustive article in the Globus, a well-known German periodical devoted to geography, Dr. Rudolph Andree sums up the achievements of the country in regard to geography, and while he claims that the nineteenth century may well be termed the century of discoveries, he comes to the conclusion that it will still be the work of many years before the surface of the earth is known. The unknown parts of the globe are illustrated in a series of charts in which the "terra incognita" is represented in black.

Concerning the regions around the north pole about which nothing is known, the tasks of future explorations may be briefly indicated as follows: In the Asiatic-European Polar Sea, from Wrangel Land in the east to north of Spitzbegen in the west the unknown is bounded by the drifts of the Jeanette in 1881 and of the Fram in 1894-1896. In north Greenland geographical knowledge does not extend, generally speaking, beyond Lockwood's farthest point in 1882. Cape Washington, and Peary's searches in the vicinity of Independence Bay, 1892, but beside these that part of the eastern coast from Cape Bismarck (Rayer, 1870,) to Independence Bay, with the ocean in front of it, is unknown. Nearly determined is the extent of Grinnell Land toward the west, while of the extent of the Ellesmere Land south of it and about the ocean north of Parry archipelago absolutely nothing is known. Large parts of the coast of Baffin's Land also need exploration. In this respect the next few years are likely to add materially to the geographical knowledge of the north polar region, for not less than four expeditions on a large scale are nearly ready to start.

Search for South Pole.

The south polar region, where the most extensive unknown territory is located, will also be attacked next year all along the line. Most of the land in this region is fixed by supposition upon the maps. Actual knowledge of land around the south pole reaches only at six points beyond 70 degrees latitude; at 170 degrees east longitude, where James Ross in 1840 discovered Victoria Land and its volcanoes and Borchgrevink in the winter of 1899-1900 found the magnetic south pole and reached the highest southern latitude so far, 78 degrees 50 minutes; at 160 degrees west longitude, where Ross in 1842 found land which is probably a continental mass; at 110 degrees west longitude (Cook, 1774); at 90 degrees west longitude, where the Belgian expedition under De Gerlache, during the winter of 1898-1899 drifted beyond 71 degrees 30 minutes soiuth latitude; at 35 degrees west longitude, where Weddell penetrated to 74 degrees 30 minutes south latitude, and finally at 15 degrees west longitude (Ross, 1843). The enormous extent of the unknown south polar region can best be illustrated if its limits are transferred to a map of the north polar region. It will then be found that the boundary would include Norway, Siberia and North America down to 65 degrees north latitude, taking in the entire northern half of Alaska.

Thibet Still a Mystery.

For the completion of the map of the Asiatic continent the researches of the nineteenth century have established new and exact bases, yet there are still smaller and larger regions which are entirely unknown. Much remains to be done in Thibet, despite the successes of Russian, English and French travelers and Indian surveyors. This is particularly the case of the land north of the route of Nain Singh (1874-1875), south of the Kwenlun and west of the route of the journey of De Rhins in 1893. North of the Kwenlun and of the routes of Prschewalski and Hedin, stretching to the Tarulo, are extensive unknown deserts. The eastern half of the Himalayas is known only in incomplete outlines. The highest peaks of the earth in this region have been measured by trigonometry from the flats of the Ganges river, but their bases nor their tops have not been reached.

Unknown in the sense of modern research is also the territory east of Bhutan across the Tsangpo, Bramaputra, and the Yang-tse-Kiang. In the southern part of Arabia is the so-called "vacant quarter," as will be seen from a glance at the map, an area more than twice the extent of the German Empire.

Activity in Africa.

In Africa the researches have been particularly active, and what is known of this continent is almost exclusively the result of work in the nineteenth century. But there is still much darkness in regard to this continent, and the classic question Quid novi ex Africa? will probably be repeated for many years. A territory little known is between the Niger in the south, the chain of oasis of the Tidikelt in the north, the route of Lenz in the west, and the routes of Barth and Duveyriers in the east. Much remains to be done in the Congo State. Here the courses of the larger rivers have been surveyed, but the vast territory between the water courses is unknown. Hard work for courageous travelers also is required to explore the region of the sources of the Congo and the adjoining part of British central Africa, Portuguese west Africa and British east Africa. The south of Madagascar is also unknown.

It may be surprising to many people that explorers have a wide range of work in North America, yet a glance at the black spots on the chart will show this to be the fact. Researches in the far Northwest and in Alaska, caused by the gold finds, only begin to show how much remains to be done here, despite the energy with which the government of the United States and of Canada push surveys year after year. Much territory in Labrador and in the regions between the great rivers and lakes of the North is also still unexplored.

Much in South America.

A glance at the chart of South America shows that this part of the western hemisphere is almost as unknown as "Darkest Africa." Of the Andes in Peru, the peaks in Bolivia, and the central mountain chains in the south of Venezuela and Guiana nothing is known. A large number of rivers have been explored within the last twenty years, but others still are waiting for the courageous traveler.

Of Australia, Arnhem Land in the north and the extensive deserts in the east of West Australia are unknown, and the north and south of South Australia have only been crossed by few routes at great distances from each other.

The face of the earth is known in great outlines, but to portray it in its detailed features is still impossible.

PROVED TO BE FORGERIES.

Tanagra Figurines in the Boston Museum Are Base Imitations.

The discovery that twenty-five of the twenty-eight Tanagra figurines in the Boston art museum are forgeries has attracted much attention from artists and art critics, largely because the Boston figurines were the best specimens of the peculiar Tanagra potteries in this country and have been widely copied, cheap imitations of some of them being found in the shop of almost every dealer in art goods and bric-a-brac. The collection has been valued at $30,000 and was given to the museum in 1879 by Thomas Appleton, whose authority on art subjects was so great that the genuineness of his gift was never questioned. It is not believed that Mr. Appleton knew that the figurines were forgeries, as the museum judges at the Louvre, at Berlin and New York were also deceived by forged figurines made by the same persons who are now known to have faked the Appleton pieces.

The first intimation that the Boston figurines were forgeries was the statement of John Marshall, an English authority, that he believed them to be spurious. Later a Greek shopkeeper from New York told the museum authorities that the figurines were part of a lot made in Athens in 1874, and that he knew the maker. He produced proof that fifteen of the men engaged in the manufacture of the fictitious figures were now in prison for the offense. Curator Robinson of the museum, after hearing the Greek's story, recognized the man named as the principal maker of the forgeries as one known to him for similar work in other lines. The man is now dead. To the credit of the museum authorities, they at once decided on an investigation of the figurines themselves, and Mr. Marshall, who had called their attention to some of the evidences of forgery, was called in to assist Curator Robinson. The figurines were scraped and the forgery at once revealed.

Beautiful Cora Livingston.

"Under the John Quincy Adams administration Cora Livingston was recognized as one of a trio of the foremost beauties of the United States," writes William Perrine in the Ladies' Home Journal. "'During the period from 1820 to 1830,' said Josiah Quincy, who had a critical eye for pretty girls, 'who has not heard of the three great belles of this country—Miss Cora Livingston of New Orleans, Miss Julia Dickenson of Troy and Miss Emily Marshall of Boston?' Indeed, he observed that he would need to know how to paint the rose to describe Miss Cora. 'In the first place,' he went on to say, 'she is not handsome; I mean not transcendentally handsome, but she has a fine figure, a pretty face, dances well, and dresses to admiration. It is the height of the ton to be her admirer, and she is certainly the belle of this country.'

"The beauty of Cora Livingston Barton had ripened early and it faded early. Long after the days of her supremacy as a belle were gone Josiah Quincy was taken to her home at Montgomery place, on the Hudson. He had not seen her for thirty years. 'Will you come into the house and see Mrs. Barton?' he was asked. He assented, and he saw an old lady in cap and dress of studied simplicity. 'You would not have known me,' she said, and he could not make reply. 'Come into the next room,' she then said, 'and you will see the Cora Livingston you knew in Washington.' There he saw the full-length portrait of the beauty to whom he had paid homage a generation before, and he could gaze upon it only in silence."

Wonderful Telegraphy.

Two Hungarians, Messrs. Pollak and Virag, who some little while ago discovered a system of very rapid telegraphy, are now said to have invented a system by which 60,000 words per hour can be transmitted and, what is more wonderful, printed in ordinary characters on a slip of sensitized paper at the receiving end. The slip comes out of the receiving instrument ready to be gummed on to a form for delivery.

CONQUEST OF THE SUN.

A correspondent at Los Angeles writes The INDEPENDENT that the Solar Motor on exhibition at the Ostrich Farm, near that city, is considered successful and is therefore attracting a vast amount of attention. Naturally it is attracting the notice of men interested in Western development, for any means of furnishing cheap power must exert a tremendous influence in this field. Among those who have studied it very closely and are apparently ready to stake their reputation on the prediction of great results to be realized from this interesting device is William E. Smythe who, as founder of the Irrigation Congress, for many years editor of the Irrigation Age, and author of "The Conquest of Arid America," is well known. He has furnished our correspondent with the following statement concerning the Solar Motor:

"The unique feature of the Solar Motor is that it uses the heat of the sun to produce steam. As no fuel is cheaper than any fuel, the saving to be effected by this device is evident. When the solar rays have heated the water in the boiler so as to produce steam, the remainder of the process is the familiar operation of compound engine and centrifugal pump.

"The reflector somewhat resembles a hugh umbrella, open and inverted at such an angle as to receive the full effect of the sun's rays on 1788 little mirrors lining its inside surface. The boiler, which is 13 feet 6 inches long, is just where the handle of the umbrella ought to be. This boiler is the focal point where the reflection from the sun is concentrated. If you reach a long pole up to the boiler it instantly begins to smoke and in a few seconds is aflame. From the boiler a flexible metallic pipe runs to the engine house near at hand. The reflector is 33 feet 6 inches in diameter at the top and 15 feet at the bottom. On the whole, its appearance is rather stately and graceful, and the glittering mirrors and shining boiler make it decidedly brilliant.

"In the morning the machine is thrown into focus by a few turns of a hand crank. In about an hour the gage in the engine house indicates 150 pounds of steam pressure. The engine may then be started and allowed to run all day without any attention. A clock-work arrangment keeps the reflector following the sun around automatically; the engine is self-oiling; the water passes back from the condenser to the boiler, so that the latter is always full. The present model runs a 10-horse power engine and lifts 1400 gallons per minute, equal to 155 miner's inches, 12 feet from an underground tank.

"It is expected that under the nearly vertical rays of the summer sun the present model will develop from 10 to 20-horse power. But this is not the limit, since several reflectors may readily be grouped about a central engine and made to produce 100-horse power, and perhaps much more. The Solar Motor is simply the cheapest possible means of producing steam because it saves all expenditure for fuel and labor. It is available for use wherever steam power is needed. It can be used to generate electricity and the power then stored in electric batteries. Other and cheaper means of storage may be devised in time. Any attempt to predict possibilities in this field would be mere guess-work, but it is safe to say that solar power will be one of the great influences of the new century and will make the arid regions of the west, and other parts of the world, the theater of the greatest industrial revolution of the future."

The billion-dollar steel trust is now an accomplished fact, Mr. Carnagie having sold out to his rivals, J. Pierpont Morgan and associates. Mr. Carnagie received an enormous price for his holdings. It was sell out or fight, and he chose the latter as the more profitable. He was ready to retire from active business anyway, and he will now have more time, and incidentally more money, to devote to the endowment of public libraries. The same men now practically control the petroleum trust, the coal trust, the railroad trust—so far as it has been formed—and the steel trust. All these are allied interests, and they carry with them a number of smaller monopolies. For instance, the Standard Oil company has interested itself in gas plants in several of the larger cities in the country, for the reason that the by-products of petroleum are used largely in the manufacture of gas. In short, the gigantic schemes that are now being perfected by Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Morgan and their associates represent the private trust idea at its logical conclusion. Each great monopoly under their control feeds the others, assists in securing the greatest possible economy of production, the cheapest transportation, and the surest, steadiest, most profitable markets. Some students of economics say that the trust idea thus carried out will not be bad for the country, if only the men who control the trust do not abuse their power. Several years ago, before the prevailing trust plan was put into operation, Hadley of Yale pointed out what was coming with the prescience of one to whom the future had been revealed. He then asked the question, "Will those who then control the monopolies of the country use their power fairly and wisely?" He did not attempt to answer the question. Consolidation, concentration, monopoly, are the order of the day. Legislation may direct and check, but it cannot destroy this industrial tendency. There are good trusts and bad trusts. As they predominate, so shall the inevitable revolution be peaceful or stormy. The public ownership of many of the sources of production or of public utility hinges upon this contingency.

DIED.

IDDINGS—At Wild Rose, Inyo Co., Cal., Feb. 11th, 1901, H. A. IDDINGS, of San Francisco.

The cause of death was peritonitis, superinduced by ptomaine poisoning resulting from eating canned tomatoes which had remained half a day in the can after being opened.

Wild Rose is about 125 miles from Independence, and is in the northern part of the Panamint range. There is no communication and obtainance of further particulars is impossible. Our advices, however, received via Ballarat, state that the deceased was Division Superintendent of the Market street railroad, and that he was out here in the interest of San Francisco people.

[The deceased arrived at Independence January 21st, and by examination ascertained from the county records the status of some certain borate lands—whether in the interest of owners or would-be locators we do not know. He went to Keeler and employed a team from Boland, with Jesus Carrasco in charge. Mr. Iddings was taken ill at Furnace Creek and the nearest physician was at Ballarat, Dr. McDonald, who met the sufferer about two hours before death. We presume that the remains were conveyed to the railroad at Johannesburg.]

The Independence Hotel has received a fine new passenger wagon.

The Independence Water Co. has a lot of repairs to make on the street mains, which work is progressing in good style.

The Georges Creek assembly hall was the scene of a fine social party last evening. The Independence participaters report having enjoyed a splendid time.

According to Farmer Robinson one of the ways to prevent recurrence of the late fuel famine would be for somebody to "strike ile." But the famine was not serious.

All hands will be glad to know that the health of Wm. L. Hunter is very much improved. He has been sojourning at Petaluma for the past two or three months.

There is a miscue somewhere about that garden seed business. California planting time is generally over before the Washington authorities wake up in the spring.

And now comes word that not only "better indications than Kern county" but that Oil has been found on the water at the Reynolds ranch, Georges Creek.

After a hardweather trip from Mojave Strohmeyer's team delivered freight along so far north as Bishop. From that supply point it returned with a big load of flour and salt.

The rapid-transit L-road idea sometimes proves a failure on a steep grade. For instance, two cases of eggs consigned to the miners of the Brown Monster in care of the Reward tramway got everlastingly smashed en route. They couldn't make the turn.

On Tuesday last, February 12th, the Independence school house flag floated in the breeze in honor of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. The martyr was born in 1809, in Kentucky, from whence his family moved to Indiana and then to Illinois. Elected President in 1860 and in 1864; assassinated April 14th, 1865.

During the late storm the slopes around Panamint Junction were covered by four feet of snow, making impassable that section of the road between Darwin and Ballarat. This will be another "flower year" for the mesas and their bases. It will also be dangerous getting to Ballarat, on account of the blue mud at the water level of Panamint Valley.

Dr. G. I. Leavitt, in employ of the Interior Department, is in the Valley vaccinating the Indian school children. He says that, while no serious appearance of the disease may be feared here, it is the policy of the Government to be extracautious in such matters. Cases of the disease, however, are known along the main railroads, and a consideration of the vaccination proposition is thus suggested to the general public.

Work of sinking the main incline on the Eclipse or Brown Monster mine is being pushed with 8-hour shifts. Accounts received yesterday state that they have sunk 15 feet since work began—the full face being in good ore. Assays have not been completed, but the ore is equal to the best that has ever been taken out of the mine.

OIL-FAKER FUN.

The ancient Ossified Man reached Independence last Monday, having been found that day by parties "prospecting for oil." The town had not been papered by advance agents, but the usual performance was given.

A storekeeper caught on the business, incidentally. A doctor became much interested. The local authority on botanical studies dropped out of his realm into a disquisition upon the curious processes of nature in a mineral way; an anthropologist asserted that the thing was not the reproduction of a dead Indian—and so said a Piute. The geologist muttered that it was concrete, without handing down an opinion in the abstract. The natural philosopher recalled the fact that flesh will not petrify, although borax, applied to like experimentation, sickened our army in Cuba. The reporter, behind a pair of Bakersfield mules, went out to examine the spot of alleged exhumation. So did the Sheriff and District Attorney, but they soon wandered. Upon being informed of the identity of the gentlemen there was a hurt-like expression in the eyes of the oil prospector.

The press agent (at special-night-rates) wired 2000 words to the New York "Exciter." The young lawyer remembered that in Selma and at Phoenix some fellows were "doing time" for some simple transactions of the same sort. The Georges Creek rancher, according to his observations, reported the object had been in that Bakersfield wagon at least a week before it was found.

And with it the fakers have faded away to the southward. "The people like to be humbugged," said Barnum.

Valentine Party.

The social event of the new century in Independence was the valentine party given by Rebekahs at their hall Tuesday evening last. Anticipations ran high when the invitations were out a week ago written in rhyme, with an appropriate water-color decoration, and the event fully justified expectation. The hall was tastefully decorated in pink and white, with emblems suitable to the occasion.

The Rebekahs received in costume, and the guests were entertained with games interspersed with songs and recitations. An entertaining feature was the postoffice, from which valentines were distributed, many of which showed much taste and originality. At midnight the guests were served with a collation, such as only the Rebekahs know how to prepare. Merriment continued until a late hour, to the general satisfaction of the guests.

Preaching, 7 p. m. Subject: Duty to follow Christ at all cost.

All are invited.

Thos. C. Boland was up from Keeler last evening. He says that oil men have sent for complete boring machinery, and that a derrick will loom up on Olancha flats within two or three weeks. This begins to look like business.

The opening of the short line between Santa Barbara and this place will stimulate business between the cities mentioned and with the towns along the route. It will also be beneficial in shortening the time of travel between Los Angeles and San Francisco. But the railway news that will have more effect upon the real estate market here than anything else in the line of present or prospective happenings in the railway world is the assurance contained in a recent special dispatch to the Herald from Denver, to the effect that the next transcontinental road connecting Denver with the Pacific coast would be built by the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway company. That strong company, it seems, is to build a line from Denver to Salt Lake, there to connect with the railroad which is projected by Senator W. A. Clark and his associates, to be built from Salt Lake to San Pedro, and is to be known as the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake railroad. The assurances of a close connection with a line of the C., B. & Q. from Salt Lake through Denver and on to the East is all that should be desired for the S. P., L. A. & S. L. railroad. Now that it has been received it may be safe to expect the making of estimates by enthusiastic real estate brokers of the length of time that will be required for this city to double its population.—Los Angeles Herald.

From an actual shipping test of the ore, recently made, R. C. Spear has found that he can mine and market the product of the Ulida mine at a profit. That there is sufficient value in the Ubehebe copper ores to justify is a remarkable thing. The Stanley group is situate some six miles south of Ubehebe Peaks, and 40 miles by trail east of the railroad terminus at Keeler. One of the ledges has been uncovered along what appears to be only one side of it for about 800 feet up the mountain, and shows solid ore from one to seven feet in width. Five varieties of copper ores are to be seen in as many different claims, but probably the "by-products" of gold and silver are what count—from that distance.

The Sonora and Big Meadows road bill has passed the State Senate by a score of twenty-nine to nothing. The people of Mono county can now rejoice, as the passing of this measure is of great importance. There is no doubt but that it will safely pass the lower house and the road will then immediately become a State highway.—Bodie Miner-Index.

Senator Wasson was a passenger for Silver Peak Monday. Mr. White, a New York mining man, is examining the mines at the Peak.—Hawthorne Bulletin.

The following letter is from Congressman Meekison, of Napoleon, Ohio:

A MUTUAL SURPRISE.

The Meeting Between an Ambitious Hunter and His First Grizzly.

In "Sketches of Life In the Golden State" Colonel Albert S. Evans tells an amusing anecdote of an ambitious hunter who met his first grizzly bear—in procession. The incident occurred in the woods near the site of the present town of Monterey.

The hunter sat down to rest in the shade of a tree and unwittingly went to sleep. When he woke, it was near sunset, and he sat up, rubbing his eyes and contemplating a return to his hotel several miles distant.

Just then a rustling and cracking noise from a clump of chaparral about 100 yards away attracted his attention. Out walked a grizzly bear, a monarch of his kind. He yawned, licked his jaws and then advanced toward the tree where our hunter sat, but evidently was unconscious of his presence.

His grizzly majesty had proceeded about 20 paces when a female bear followed him, and an instant later a third grizzly followed her at a slow, shambling pace.

The hunter sat spellbound with terror as the procession came toward him until the forward grizzly was within 30 yards. Then, scarcely realizing what he did, he sprang to his feet and uttered a frenzied yell—yell upon yell!

The effect was magical. The foremost bear sprang into the air, turned sharply about, knocked the female down, rolled over her, gathered himself up and bolted "like 40 cartloads of rock going down a shoot," straight for the chaparral again, the other two bears close at his heels and never turning to see what had frightened them.

The hunter, seeing the enemy retreating, sprang to his feet and fled at top speed for the hotel, leaving hat and gun behind. The truth of his wild and startling tale was proved the next day by the numerous bear tracks of different sizes found in the marshy ground near by. But the three bears had gone off beyond pursuit.

A Witty Irishman.

Some friends of Archbishop Whately, after dining with him, asked him to show them a specimen of Irish wit. Taking a stroll in the street, he inquired of a crossing sweeper which of the two the devil would take if he was obliged to secure one of them.

"Pl'ase, yer riverence, ask Father Malony yonder."

"No; I want your opinion."

"Och, yer riverence, I'm sorry to say he'd take me!"

"And why so, Terence?"

"Och, because he's sure of yer riverence at any time!"

Clothes and the Man.

If a Filipino enters the house of a European living in an unassuming way, he will not believe that the European is either wealthy or wise, and although his manner may be correct it will not be humble. On the other hand, if he visits an ignorant man who indulges in great splendor, he will at once become exceedingly respectful.

Mr. Phelps Whitmarsh, who in The Outlook gives his experiences in the islands, tells the story of a wealthy provincial visiting Manila for the first time, who asked to be presented to the governor general.

When he reached the palace, he found the governor taking coffee on his piazza, dressed comfortably in a white cotton suit. The Filipino requested that some favor be extended to his district, and his request was granted. He then withdrew. The official who had procured the presentation asked him what he thought of the general.

"Why," replied the visitor in a tone of disappointment, "he is no different from any other white man."

It so happened that the general was told of the incident, and he gave orders that at his next reception the Filipino should be present.

Upon entering the throneroom and seeing the general in full uniform, surrounded by his brilliant staff, with the accessories of splendid tapestries, laced ushers and all the pomp and splendor of these Spanish functions, the provincial grew pale and, kneeling in deep humility, exclaimed:

"This is indeed my general!"

So impressed was he that the following morning he sent a pair of handsome horses to the general with a note which read:

"My general, yesterday I liked you so much in your uniform of gold that I send you this pair of horses, but do not use them when you dress in a white suit."

Mirror Mad.

"What!" exclaims the astonished reader, "is it possible that there are any civilized persons on the face of the earth who are not in the habit of beholding their visages reflected from time to time in a mirror of some kind? Surely this cannot be so." Wrong, quite wrong, gentle reader, for at the present time, strange as it may appear, there are hundreds of men and women in the United Kingdom who have not gazed into a mirror for years.

The convicts confined in British prisons form members of this community. From the moment of a convict's entrance to a jail to the moment of his exit he is not permitted to have the use of a mirror of any kind, the smallest piece of glass being rigidly denied him. To the women convicts this absence of a mirror forms one of the chief hardships of confinement, and many a female warder can tell piteous tales of women who have actually fallen upon their knees and sobbed out entreaties for the loan of a morsel of mirror—"just for a second." All these entreaties have perforce to be disregarded, and it therefore comes about that many a female convict passes three or four years without being permitted to gaze upon her own features.—London Tit-Bits.

Knew He Loved Her.

Mrs. Duncan Stewart described Lady Beaconsfield as originally a factory girl. Mr. Lewis first saw her going to her factory, beautiful and with bare feet. He educated her and married her, died and left her very rich, and then she married Disraeli. When asked why she married her second husband, she would say, as if it was a feather in her cap, "My dear, he made love to me while my first husband was alive, and therefore I knew that he really loved me."—Augustus J. C. Hare's Recollections.

Giving Him a Rest.

The energy of one of the oldest inhabitants of a Massachusetts town is a byword among his neighbors and a trial to his grandchildren, who have not inherited their full share of his active temper.

His grandson John in particular suffers from the old man's untiring industry, for John is his assistant in the little grocery shop, where everything, from codfish to brooms, may be found. A purchaser of gingersnaps lingered one day to hear the noontime address delivered to poor John by his grandfather.

"Now, Johnny, I'm a-going home for my dinner," said the old man briskly, "and on the way I'll carry up these pails to Miss Manson and fetch back her kerosene can. I shall be gone up'ards of half an hour. You'll have plenty of time to eat your luncheon, and while you're resting after that I wish you'd saw up that little mess of wood that lays out by the back door and split it up for stove kindling, for the weather's turning sharp a'ready.

"Most likely I'll be back 'fore you get out o' work, and anyways I don't want to keep you at it all the time, so if there's a few extry minutes jest set down and make out a bill or two. The fust of the month'll be upon us 'fore we know it."—Youth's Companion.

Helping the Enemy.

A coal heaver was getting in a load of coal in the suburbs of London. He was shoveling in the coals at a good rate when he was startled by a terrific yell from the house adjoining.

"Wot the dickens is the matter?" queried the coalman, starting up.

A disheveled looking individual made his appearance at the door.

"Matter, you thickhead!" shouted the man, frantically endeavoring to pull his hair up in clots by the roots, "you are putting the coal down the wrong hole. My wife's people live there!"—London Tit-Bits.

His Limit.

"I'm getting along," said Mr. Cumrox. "I'm progressing slowly, but surely."

"In what?"

"Culture. I've been traveling around with Mrs. C. and the girls until I'm getting right refined. But there's one thing I don't think I'll achieve. I don't believe I'll ever be able to go into an antique store and tell the difference between bric-a-brac and junk."—Washington Star.

The Equinoxes.

The equinoctial storms are no longer believed in by scientific persons. The equinoxes are the dates of the year when the sun crosses the equator at one of the equinoctial points. They occur about March 21 and Sept. 21, and, though storms have been known to occur about those times, they are no longer considered as due to the perfectly natural occurrence of the crossing.

Like the buffalo of the plains, many wild animals, dispossessed by the advance of civilization, are rapidly disappearing from the regions in which they once abounded. In an article which will appear in The Youth's Companion, Dr. Felix Oswald points out where they are still numerous and undisturbed, and where the huntsman may still find a "paradise."

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that can not be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

GREAT DAM MADE OF SODA.

One of the Most Wonderful Natural Freaks in a Montana Canyon.

Probably few people ever heard of a soda dam, but such a freak of nature really exists in an unfrequented part of the great West. A. O. Wright of the Indian service, who travels extensively through that section of the country west of the Missouri River, in speaking of strange things he has encountered in his tours alluded to this soda dam. Asked what he meant by a soda dam, he said:

"In Box canyon, just above the hot springs of the Jemez River, Arizona, is a dam extending from one wall of the gorge to the other. This dam is nothing more or less than a massive wall of pure soda, rising to a height of 100 feet, and probably 600 feet from end to end. Nature's forces, of course, started their work of construction away back in the dim and distant past, when deposits of soda contained in the water thrown off by the springs were made at the base of what has since developed into one of the natural wonders of the West. Those deposits must have been made with remarkable rapidity.

"Just ten years ago the Jemez River rose to an unprecented height, and under the abnormal pressure of the torrent a lower section of the dam gave way, leaving a breach in the wall of soda about twenty feet high. When the water subsided the lake formed by the dam was of course destroyed, leaving the upper eighty feet of the dam high and dry.

"I passed through that section of Arizona this last summer and purposely visited the soda dam. I was most astonished to see that the twenty-foot breach had been nearly filled in. The soda from the springs had made fresh deposits and gradually patched up the hole made in 1890. At the present rate the breach will be entirely closed in another year and the lake will resume its former proportions.

"Previous to the break in the dam the lake above was fully 600 feet wide and extended up the canyon for at least three-quarters of a mile. Scientists who have examined the dam are of the opinion that it will never attain a height much above 100 feet, for the deposits in the water seem to sink in that great depth before the brink is reached. As they fall, however, they will tend to strengthen the base of the dam and will gradually decrease the depth of the lake at its lower end."—Washington Star.

QUEER STORIES

The crust of earth under Japan must be comparatively thin, judging by the number of earthquake shocks in that country. They average over five hundred a year.

Philadelphia was the largest of American cities at the time the first census was taken, 110 years ago, and New York was second, Boston was then third, Charleston fourth and Baltimore fifth.

The typhoon of the Orient is an own sister of the West India cyclone. It is generally in low altitudes, late in the summer or early in the autumn, at the western edge of the Pacific, not far from the Philippines. It begins its career by moving westward, but in time returns to the coast of China and Japan.

The Charter Oak is in Hartford, Conn., and concealed the charter of the colony for several years from 1687. Washington took command of the army under an elm tree in Cambridge. The treaty elm, under which William Penn signed the famous treaty with the Indians in 1682, was upon the banks of the Delaware. It died in 1829.

The largest hothouses in the country devoted exclusively to the cultivation of orchids are in New Jersey. Four hundred varieties may be found there from Colombia, Venezuela, Brazil, Ecuador, Bolivia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras and Mexico, the principal supply sources; also from other tropical and subtropical countries, including one from the Philippines, which has taken kindly to American soil.

Properties of Sulphate of Quinine.

Sulphate of quinine has some very curious properties, one of them being its power to impress an image of itself on a sheet of sensitive paper in the dark. If a design be drawn on a sheet of paper with sulphate of quinine, exposed for a few minutes to the sun, then placed on a sheet of sensitive paper, put in a book and left for a few hours, a perfect image of the drawing will be found impressed on the sheet of paper. Writing may be copied on sensitive paper in this way, but it must be reversed, or the writing will be reversed on the sensitive paper.

Remains of Ancient Man.

In some grottoes in Algeria French explorers recently discovered stone implements mingled with the remains of extinct animals belonging to quarternary times. Further explorations indicate that during the age when the grottoes were inhabited the coast of Algeria had a configuration different from that of to-day. Among the animals associated with the ancient human inhabitants of Algeria were the rhinoceros, the hippopotamus and various species of ruminants.

Odd Story of Remenyi.

When Remenyi, the late famous violinist, was a young man he was engaged by a parvenu to play at a dinner, the agreement being that he was to furnish music from 8 until 11 o'clock. He opened the program with an andante movement from Mozart, a composition commencing very slow and soft. The host turned to his guests, and in a petulant tone said: "That's just like those musicians. I hired him by the hour, and see how slowly he plays."

Comforting Poor Papa.

A well-known business man whose head is bare, yet who wears a luxuriant growth of whiskers, was being railed recently for being bald by some of his intimate friends in the presence of his small daughter. Little Mabel didn't understand that it was all in jest, and crawling upon her parent's lap put her arms about his neck and turned defiantly toward his tormentors: "My papa w'ud ruvver hav' his top hair on his chin, w'udn't you, papa?"

The New Cup Defender,

Now being built, is confidently expected to be the fastest sailing vessel ever built. Its construction is being kept a secret, but it is whispered that it will easily hold the cup. America is rapidly coming to the front. A good example of this is in that famous household remedy, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which has defended health for half a century past. It holds the record for the cure of dyspepsia, indigestion, constipation, nervousness, biliousness and la grippe.

The average woman is not averse to being looked after, for she is nearly always conceited enough to think she commands every man's admiration.

THE OLD-FASHIONED FIDDLER.

Oh, rare old-fashioned fiddler, how your distant mellow tunes
In recollection's crevices are sobbing, while the croons
Of tender heart-born melody in misty music swoons
In far, faint dreams where cadence beams across life's dim lagoons.

When you played the "Devil's Dream," old fiddler, long ago,
Or "Fire in the Mountain" blazed from your strings and bow,
Or "Nellie Gray," "The Flying Cloud," or "Where the Waters Flow,"
With finger tips upon its lips your music quivered so.

And while enchanted cherubim were knocking at the door
The tapping of your massive foot kept time upon the floor;
A halo seemed to take the place of that old hat you wore,
Your rugged hands were like two wands that charmed me more and more.

Oh, rare old-fashioned fiddler with your music unsurpassed
From out the gloom of other years, the gloom that's deep and vast;
Come and play your music through, I'd hear you to the last,
Oh, come to me from mystery where time has held you fast.

—Denver News.

Like a Tale that Is Told.

IT was one of those June afternoons when one is filled with the joy of living, and London was bathed in mellow sunshine. Mrs. Varney leaned back in her victoria as it bore her through the park and along Piccadilly, delighting in the beauty of the day, the vast blueness above her and the hum of moving life around. She was one of the women who enjoy life and love to bask in the sunshine. As they passed an imposing-looking club, a man standing on the step raised his hat. In response to Mrs. Varney's signal the carriage drew up to the curb and he came across the pavement.

"What a glorious afternoon," she said, after the first greeting, 'and I am going to spend an hour of it under a roof."

"Any particular roof?"

"The Academy."

"Won't it be stuffy?"

"Will you try the experiment with me, or are you otherwise engaged?"

"I am at liberty, and shall be delighted."

He took his seat beside her, and they drove on once more.

"I was so pleased to meet you again," she said, with a ring of genuineness in her tone.

"And I am glad of this opportunity for a quiet talk; it was an impossibility the other evening. You have been abroad ten years—what are your impressions on returning? It must be so very interesting to go away for such a long time."

"It was not always interesting."

"The coming back must be—meeting people again and drifting into the same current once more."

"Yes, I find a pleasure in seeing things—and people."

She flashed one of her bright smiles at him.

"I was a girl in the schoolroom when you came to say goodby; it seems centuries ago."

"You had a brown plait down your back."

"My pigtail! Oh, I discarded that soon afterward. I came out that winter you know. Married Mr. Varney the following spring, and have been a widow four years. It represents a lifetime, doesn't it? Have I altered very much?"

He looked down at the beautiful, smiling face.

"If it were not for the regrettable absence of the pigtail, I should say not at all."

"How nice of you. But, really, I have altered, of course. And you look—older."

"I feel older."

There was something of sadness in his voice.

"I was not a very young man when I went out, and India—especially that little cit yon the Plains—does not tend to rejuvenate one."

"I wonder why you stayed."

"I was the fifth life from the title, and a poor man."

'I see. How strange it all is."

The carriage turned into the courtyard of Burlington House, and they alighted.

"You have not seen the pictures yet, of course," she said, as they went up the stairs.

"No, my time has been fairly well occupied, for the two weeks I have been home."

"Then I must show you all those that are talked about, and one or two I like, that are not talked about."

Conversing lightly, they entered the rooms and Mrs. Varney drew her companion's attention to the pictures of the year, showing a good knowledge of her catalogue, and amusing him with witticisms.

As they entered the third room a small picture "on the line" caught his eye, so that he went forward, almost abruptly.

"I spent my boyhood there—and left it behind me."

His voice was very grave, and a tired look had come into his worn, brown face, so that she checked the idle words rising to her lips and stood beside him in silence while he gazed at the little picture, and stood before it.

"Number 2237," Mrs. Varney said consulting her catalogue. "The Old Church at Brentwell in Norfolk."

Perhaps her greatest charm was that she always understood.

He turned in a moment or so.

"It was very good of you to bring me here," he said.

"I am glad you have been interested. Now, shall we go back into the sunshine; I was going on to my sister's to tea. Do you remember Ethel, the other jigtail? She is married now. Will you come and see if she has altered?"

"Thanks, I shall be pleased."

* * * * * * * *

When the slow afternoon train stopped at Barton Gate, Lord Farehaven alighted from a first-class compartment, the only traveler.

"Luggage?" interrogated the porter.

"No, I have only my bag; can you send it on to the Crown at Brentwell?"

"There's no fear o' that, I think. Some 'un is sure to be goin' that way. If not, I'll send one o' my boys."

So Lord Farehaven went through the gate and along the well-remembered road to Brentwell village, a distance of two miles, which he soon covered with his easy, swinging stride.

There had been no one to speak of in the Crown all day, for it was haying time and every man was in the fields. An old man sat by the fireside, although no fire burnt on the hearth, and smoked meditatively; no sound save the tick of a grandfather's clock broke the silence. Then a firm step sounded without, a hand raised the latch, and Lord Farehaven entered the low-ceiled kitchen which served also as bar.

"Good day, Mr. Rolfe," he said pleasantly.

"Good day to yew, sir, though I doan't rightly know hew yew be."

"A stranger to these parts for many years. My name was Steele—Hubert Steele—when I lived about here."

"Steele? Ah! my memory ain't what it was! I'm going on eight-four year come Michaelmas, y' see, an' I forget names an' such like."

"Can I have a bed here to-night?"

"Ah! that yew can. I'll just call my gran'darter," the old man replied, rising to the back door, which, when opened, disclosed a vista of meadowlands and haystacks. "'Liza! 'Liza!" he called in his old, feeble voice. "Where's that there mawther gone? Arter them chaps that's raking in the medder, I'll lay. 'Liza!"

He hobbled out of sight, and Lord Farehaven sat himself on the warm sofa that he remembered to have stood in the same place twenty years ago—when Gabriel Rolfe had been a hale old man with a face like a ruddy pippin and with a hearty voice.

'Liza came in presently, a shy girl of some 16 years, and from her he learned a good deal of the changes time had wrought in the little village. Then he ordered some dinner to be prepared for him, and strolled out into the village street and toward the church.

The old church at Brentwell stands on slightly rising ground and commands an extensive view of the broad fen land.

Lord Farehaven leaned upon the low stone wall that skirts the churchyard, gazing at the sacred edifice, while his boyhood memories crowded thick and fast around him. He remembered just such a June evening as this—sitting beside his mother in the old worm-eaten oak pew, listening indolently to the service, with his attention wandering ever and again to Pleasance Greenacre, sitting on the other side of the aisle, sometimes turning her gray eyes shyly to meet his, and a shaft of golden light striking through the west window, turning her long, fair hair into a living name. How he had adored her—twenty years ago. He wondered if she were alive—a wife and mother perhaps; and wondering still, entered the iron gate and walked among the green graves, some with stones at their head, some neglected and forgotten. In one corner he came upon a little flower-covered grave, surrounded with white stones, and having a cross at the head. It bore these words:

"To the memory of Pleasance Greenacre, who died on Easter Day, 1885."

The setting sun shone full upon the stone, as in years gone by it had shone on Pleasance Greenacre's golden hair.

* * * * * * * *

It was Sunday afternoon and Mrs. Varney had strolled into Kensington gardens, preferring the shade of the trees to her drawing room—a view shared entirely by the two fox terriers who accompanied her.

She found a comfortable shady seat, and settled herself down to think; and her thoughts were of Lord Farehaven.

She called him Hubert to herself, because he had been Hubert when he was her brother's greatest chum, in the days before he went to India. Hubert Steele had been her ideal, and Lord Farehaven did not fall far short of it. She had been very glad to meet him again, more glad than she cared to acknowledge—and he had seemed glad, too. Looking up she saw him approaching, and her pulses quickened.

"I learned you were in the gardens," he said, seating himself at her bidding, "so decided to follow you."

"I hardly expected you to-day, or anyone, and so I brought my poor doggies out for a run. They hate London. Have you been away? I half thought you would be at the opera last night. Ethel and I looked in vain for you."

"I ran down into the country for a day, on Friday, and only returned at 8 last evening."

She remembered the picture.

"And is it like what it was?"

"Like and unlike. It all seems so unreal—like a tale that is told."

"I know that feeling—as though one had been some one else in those far-off days. The past never satisfies me. Some people live in the past; I think the present is the happiest time. It is a mistake to treasure up dead rose leaves when the roses bloom every year."

"And yet the scent of the dead leaves is sweet."

"Not so sweet as the freshly gathered roses from the garden."

Lord Farehaven looked gravely at her.

"We may not all pluck them," he said.

'Perhaps it is because we do not dare—or do not care," she replied softly.

"Gladys," he said, taking her little gloved hand in his own. "Will you show me where to gather the roses?"—Mainly About People.

ODD LONGINGS OF CHILDREN.

They Want Money Purses, Scent Bottles and Gold-Headed Canes.

"Children's wants are often surprising," said the matron of an institution for homeless little ones. "Once there came here a poor, little, neglected, half-starved, lame girl.

"A charitably disposed woman took her for a drive. On the way home she brought the child through the shopping district.

"'Now, tell me what you want most of everything you have seen. Is it a doll?'

"'Please, ma'am, I'd like a bottle of scent,' was the unexpected answer, as she pointed to a bottle of cologne."

On another ocasion a lady who was visiting the institution asked a small boy what she must bring him for Christmas. "A walking-stick with a gold head," he said quickly.

"That is the way with the children," the matron explained. "They have never been used to playthings and they don't miss them.

"An instance of this was an orphan who had been banged around during her seven years of life from one poor family to another. None of them had been able to give her more than barely enough to eat and a few old cast-off rags for clothes.

"A wealthy woman became interested in the unhappy tot after she came to us.

"'You're to have a new dress and a new hat,' she told the waif, 'and something else nice. Now what is that something else?'

"'Is it a purse—a money purse?' she shouted. 'That's what I've always wanted more'n anything in the world.'"

How He Got Even.

One of my most successful excursions, says the author of an entertaining article on Modern Jerusalem in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly, resulted from the opportune appearance of a goat on top of a stone wall. It was down near the bazaars.

"What is the goat doing up there?" I inquired.

"He has gone up there to eat," said the dragoman.

"To eat?"

"Yes, to—what you call pasture."

"Pasture on the roof?"

"Yes, it is large. Many things grow there. You wish to go up?"

It ended in our getting two Moslem lads to show us a place where it was possible to climb the wall with the help of cracks for hands and feet. At least it was possible for them to climb it, but I slipped when about halfway up, and came down sprawling. The Moslem lads laughed heartily, which was mortifying; so when we finally got safely up (I was pulled and boosted) I made the dragoman translate the proverb which says that every man is good at his own game. And I offered them a plaster each to imitate me in a little thing that any lad in my country would do easily. They wished to try.

"Stand on your left foot," said I, "like this. Bend your right foot up and hold it in your right hand—so. Then go down slowly until your right knee touches the ground—so, and come up again."

The Moslem lads tried this several times, and went sprawling after each attempt, while I laughed.

"Tell them that is my game," I said, and felt better.

The Continued Story.

"I never let a man die at the end of a chapter," the historian Freeman once said, "because Johnny Green told me not to." The modern continued story exemplifies a like theory of pausing at the very brink of an absorbing event. We sometimes complain of a novel which runs a year serially. Let us think on our mercies.

The first two parts of the "Astree," one of the most famous of French novels, were published in 1610. An admiring public waited four or five years for the third part and several more for the fourth and fifth parts.

At the same time lived Mademoiselle de Scudery, memorable as the author of the first romances of any note written by a woman. She composed, and published by installments, novels of a length unknown to the feeble readers of to-day. Every story was originally issued in batches of small octavos, sometimes running to a score or so! Mr. Vincent describes her as "the most pitiless writer of fiction that the world has ever known."

The same seventeenth century illustrates again the willingness of French writers to bide their time. The poet Malherbe wished to console a friend on the death of his wife. By the time the poem was finished the gentleman had been consoled, remarried, and was himself dead!

Left Undone.

When one invests one's capital in a vocation or a mission of life, one cannot afford to have friends. The expensiveness of friendship does not lie in what one does for one's friends, but in what one, out of regard for them, leaves undone. This means the crushing of many an intellectual germ.

Food Value of Fish.

Fish has very high food value; in fact, is very nearly as nutritious as chicken or turkey.

Some men are bigamists, but one wife is more than the average man can manage.

GARDEN OF EDEN FOR RENT.

The British Government Offers the Seychelles for Lease.

Somebody, having the price and being so disposed, may take a long term lease on the site of the Garden of Eden. The British government of the Seychelles in the Indian Ocean has given notice that bids will be received for periods of nine, twenty-one and thirty years on the islands of the Aldabra group proper, the Cosmoledo group, and the islands of Astove and Assumption. As to just which one of the islands was the home of Adam and Eve, however, the man who takes the lease must determine.

According to travelers almost any of these islands might easily fill the fanciful conditions that may have existed with the first man. There "every prospect pleases," and on many of the islands there are no men to be vile. The lessee of these islands will take them for purely commercial purposes, but their settings are considered to be ideal for dreamer or painter.

Fixing upon the Seychelles group as having contained the site of Eden, the archaeologist has had little more to guide him than has one who chose the South Sea Islands. The four quarters of the globe have been settled upon by one or another as the place of this garden described in Genesis, but in the Seychelles selection the beauties of the islands have been emphasized as lending color to the belief.

There are eighty of these in the general group, having an area of about 102 English square miles. Of these eighty islands only eighteen are inhabited. They rise from a bank, submerged from ten to forty fathoms, and lie almost on the equator, in the blue of the Indian Ocean. Aden, on the Suez Canal, is 1,400 miles northwest, and Zanzibar is 1,000 miles west. The islands were discovered by the Portuguese at the beginning of the sixteenth century, but they made no efforts to occupy them. The French took possession of the group in 1742, calling them after Count Herault de Seychelles of the East Indian fleet. The British wrested them from the French in 1794, taking Mauritius also. Mahe is the largest island and has the seat of government, called Victoria. This capital is an admiralty coaling station, about thirty days' travel from London.

LOCATION AND SKETCHES IN THE SEYCHELLES.

Most of these islands rise deeply from the sea. Those of the Aldabra group and the islands of Mauritius and Reunion are of volcanic origin. The Seychelles proper are of granite formation, and from them to the west the sea deepens rapidly until soundings have been taken from 9,000 to 12,000 feet.

Most peculiar of these island groups are the Seychelles, with their towering mountains, crowned with castellated blocks of gray granite and even the valleys studded with them. The mountains rise from 2,600 to 3,000 feet above sea level and are sources of many of the rapid streams that course through the islands. The rainfall in a year may aggregate 100 inches or more, and these wash down the granite fragments from the hills, cutting gorges and canyons in the rock formation. The rocks, however, serve the purpose of retaining the rich soil of the islands and most of them are jungles of tropical vegetation.

It is a land of ease and plenty. Creoles from Mauritius and Reunion effected a settlement of the main islands about 150 years ago. In 1850 negroes were imported as laborers from Mozambique. Europeans, Indians and Chinese have followed until the population of the eighteen inhabited islands is about 20,000 of all shades, most of them speaking the French tongue, in spite of the 100 years' occupancy by the British.

Until the English commissioners took up the government of the Seychelles piracy was one of the evils of that portion of the Indian Ocean. The British broke this up, however, and for many years the islands have been the home of the indolent. To-day the island industries are fishing and the growing of tropical fruits and vegetables. The cocoa palm is one of the chief sources of revenue to the island. Sugar cane, vanilla, cloves, pepper, coffee and sweet potatoes are produced in great quantities.

Live on Five Cents a Day.

Five cents a day is the cost of living among the Ruskinites, or members of the socialist colony, which, after becoming somewhat famous in Tennessee, was transported to a site near Waycross, Ga., where it now flourishes.

Co-operation is the secret of these remarkable economic conditions. By combining exercising thrift, discretion and a good deal of self-denial the 5 cents daily expended purchases enough to keep each Ruskinite robust and cheerful. The bill of fare that results is by no means palate-tickling, but it is adequate and hygienic, and the Ruskinites say they like it. Any one might, living in the open air and exercising vigorously. In any case, they are proud of having demonstrated something. They are living on the lowest daily expenditure that is possible, and that is a triumph of a sort.

Here is an outline of the fashion in which this economic miracle is accomplished:

All provisions are bought at wholesale and in large quantities. They are then cooked in the community kitchen and cooked, of course, by the colonists. Socialists do not employ servants. When cooked the food is served in the community dining room, where tables are set for 300 persons.

Vegetables are the chief article of the Ruskinite diet, and as they are raised by the community itself they are abundant and cheap. In seasons when fewer vegetables are produced the daily cost of living is increased from 5 to 7 cents.

Penny Savings a Success.

A penny saved is a penny earned seems to be the motto upon which the Penny Savings Society of Chicago, organized June 15, 1897, has been proceeding. The object of this society is to teach thrift and frugality. Through the medium of purchasing bright, attractive stamps from one penny upward, children have been taught the lesson of economy and saving. A total of 1,875,050 stamps from 1 cent up to 50 have been purchased since the organization of the society, and its influence is widely extending through the co-operation of the schools, the social settlements, the bureau of associated charities and other organizations. Whenever a sufficient sum has been saved in this way the saver is advised to deposit it in a saving bank, and thus habits of saving are inculcated.

In this way pennies that formerly went for cigarettes, candy, gum and various other artices have found their way to the society, where they have accumulated until by their aid shoes, clothing, books, etc., were purchased with them, or a bank account was opened. Self-help and the inculcation of right habits of economy are what the work of the society represents, and it has now become a factor of importance in the training of the young.—Chicago News.

Horseshoes for Luck.

The custom of keeping horseshoes for luck is said to have originated at the time when in every home was the picture of the patron saint. About the head of the saint was the distinguished halo, which was frequently made of metal, sometimes the shape of a horseshoe. When anything happened to the picture the halo was kept and remained fastened to the door, in order that the saint's influence might still prevail. As the bit of metal was the most substantial part of the picture it soon became the custom to make a charm of this part only, and the horseshoe followed logically as a prevention against evil.

Problems of the Ages.

The lecturer on occult science clasped her hands and leaned forward on the stand in front of her.

"I have endeavored," she said, "to make this subject as plain as its inherently mysterious nature will permit. Before I take my seat, however, I will wait a moment to answer any question you may like to ask for the purpose of clearing up whatever points may still seem obscure to you."

"I wish you could tell me, ma'am," asked a hollow-voiced, cadaverous man, rising up in a distant corner of the hall, "why women kiss each other."—Chicago Tribune.

Guards the Chickens Well.

According to an American the best guardian for poultry is a Scotch collie. It is readily taught to guide ducks, geese, etc., to their feeding grounds and bring them back. The collie, it appears, takes a lively interest in the work and his courage makes him a good protector.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

In China coal miners work twelve hours a day for 10 cents a day.

The Omaha Bee predicts that soon the big heading type for newspapers will be a thing of the past.

The municipal authorities of Glasgow are considering a proposition for the establishment of a city savings bank.

Tea and sugar cost Russia yearly $264,000,000; spirits, beer and wine are consumed to the value of $140,000,000 only.

Clerks and the clergy are the most numerous patrons of the bicycle. Teachers are also great patrons of the wheel.

At the beginning of this century British shipping amounted to only 2,000,000 tons. A maximum of 10,000,000 tons marks the commencement of its decline.

St. Louis has a man who smokes 159 cigarettes every day. When last heard of he was so nervous that his wife refused to let him take a gun and go hunting.

London agents will ask the government to establish a national art gallery in this country. They have an idea that the taste for art in America should be cultivated.

Lord Rosebery has aroused all England by telling them that America is the center of the Anglo-Saxon race and that if Pitt had lived longer Queen Victoria would be ruling from Washington.

Daniel Chester French is the "author" of the symbolical statues which are to ornament the State Capitol Building at St. Paul, Minn. It is a fortunate artist who gets a commission from a State patron.

Wu-Ting-Fang is disposed to be charitable. In a recent speech at Pittsburg he said: "Here the rich use the ample means at their disposal for the benefit of the people, and the people have good reason to bless the rich."

A man in New York has lost a day when he has not perfected something new. He has turned out his one-hundred-and twenty-seventh patented invention, consisting of a finger-ring that cuts twine and erases marks on a package.

Socrates: "If the soul be immortal, it requires to be cultivated with attention, not only for what we call the time of life, but for that which is to follow—I mean eternity; and the least neglect in this point may be attended with endless consequences."

Book-buyers will pay occasionally a good round price for an old book. In London a thirty-one-page pamphlet relating to New York and printed in 1670 brought $2,000. It was not bought to hold for a rise in the market, but will go into a private library.

Old guns are not valued highly. The guns which cost Uncle Sam about $1,000,000 went on the "bargain counter" at the Charlestown navy yard and only sold for $12,000. They were antiquated pieces which had been discarded from the Boston harbor defenses.

The Japanese people have an "open door" for all new ideas. Their government is considering the advisability of inflicting capital punishment by means of suffocation—placing the subject in an air-tight chamber, and then exhausting the air from the chamber by means of a pump.

When a State is smaller than a city and has more legislative representation there is room for considering why this should be so. The Louisville Times says: "The State of Delaware, with its three votes in the Electoral College, cast a smaller popular vote than did Louisville, in point of population the eighteenth city of the Union."

When Spain goes into comparison with an up-to-date nation the result is not flattering to her. Spain has only 11,500 miles of railway, while France, of about the same area, has 36,000. Spain transports annually 16,000,000 passengers and 8,000,000 tons of minerals and merchandise; France transports 400,000,000 passengers and 110,000,000 tons of goods.

The London Sketch has the following: The late Prof. Thomas Davidson was a master of many languages. On one occasion he had an interview with the Pope. The conversation was carried on in several languages, including ecclesiastical Latin. At this last his Holiness remarked that his visitor must be an Italian. "Ego sum Scotus," replied Prof. Davidson: "I am a Scotchman."

The evil comes in with the good. The St. Paul Pioneer Press says: "There is always some plaguey worm hole or rotten spot in the apples which Uncle Sam puts into his annexation basket. With New Mexico we annexed the Gila monster; with Hawaii, the leprosy; with the Philippines, Aguinaldo; and now comes the story that if we acquire the Danish West Indies we shall annex therewith a new kind of grasshopper.

TALISMANS

Worn by Monarchs and Potentates to Prevent Disaster.

Some of the most powerful monarchs in the world are the possessors of talismans, the loss of which would fill them with dire forebodings and dismay.

The autocratic Czar of all the Russias constantly carries about with him a ring, without which nothing would induce him to move a step from his palace. Though this is really a fiction, it is believed to contain a tiny piece of the cross on which the Savior was crucified.

The ring is supposed to be endowed with some occult power of shielding its wearer from personal danger; hence the Czar's anxiety to always have it with him. Belief in its magic influence was immensely strengthened by the fact of the present Emperor's grandfather being without the ring at the moment of his assassination.

The Shah of Persia always wears a belt set with a superb emerald, to which he ascribes the same virtue as the Czar attribute to his sacred ring. The belt is filled with onion peeling, the object of which is said to be to move any would-be assassin to tears.

When the late Shah visited this country he was never seen in public without this protecting belt and gem. He thoroughly believed that if he traveled without the emerald disaster would overtake him, and by a strange coincidence it actually did.

It will be remembered that this Persian monarch was foully assassinated not many years ago, and it was a singular fact that he was not wearing the gem at the time.

King George of Greece possesses a talisman which is also a grim reminder of an attempt on his life. Just at the conclusion of the war with Turkey he was waylaid and shot at several times, one of the bullets imbedding itself in the box of his carriage.

His majesty's escape was so miraculous that he had this bullet extracted and made into a charm for his watch-chain. He would not part with it for a kingdom, firmly believing that, as it mercifully missed him when directed at him, it was designed to insure him immunity from assassination.

The Sultan of Turkey, who lives in constant dread of what has been described as the "happy dispatch," would not be an Oriental if he did not believe in the efficacy of charms. His own particular talisman is said to be a richly bejeweled miniature dagger, which he invariably carries about with him.

Despite its virtues, however, he takes the precaution of insisting on one of his ministers tasting every dish prepared for him before partaking of it himself.

When the late German Emperor was lying desperately ill at San Remo a remakable amulet was sent to him by the Sultan. It consisted of a string of nine stones of the size of hazel nuts, each of which bore an inscription from the Koran and had been prayed over by a moslem priest.

Accompanying this royal talisman was a letter assuring the Emperor that if he only wore it his health would be at once restored.

The Ameer of Afghanistan wears a beautiful gold ring, to which he ascribes the fact of his having survived so long the machinations of his enemies. He has been a good many times reported dead, but thanks to the magic of his golden ring he still lives to praise its protecting virtues.

Defeating Himself.

One day, writes a Western missionary, we were traveling across the plains in the caboose of a freight train. A young divinity student was with us, one of the argumentative kind who prejudice their hearers at once against theology. He was ready to argue about anything and everything, and presently engaged in a heated discussion with a grimy tramp, on the disadvantages of education.

The tramp maintained that the less a man knew and the less education he had, the happier he was. He showed so much skill and adroitness, such mastery of logic and literature, that he absolutely routed the poor boy, so that the latter rose and went out on the platform, leaving the other chuckling over his pipe in huge enjoyment of an easy victory. Suddenly a listener turned to him, and asked suddenly:

"What college are you from?"

The tramp, takes by surprise, did not stop to consider the weight his answer would carry against his own argument.

"Yale," said he.

He had defeated himself.

The Ticket Came Back.

A recent number of the Railway Journal contains a well-authenticated story of a railway ticket which took a sudden journey on its own account.

As a north-bound train on the Colorado and Southern road passed one of the stations a passenger in a forward car raised a window, and in an instant his ticket was blown from his hands out-of-doors.

The passenger naturally gave it up for lost, and was very much surprised when the baggage-master handed it to him a little while later.

It appears that when the ticket flew through the window a south-bound train was passing. The suction of that train, which was moving at a rapid rate, drew the ticket along with it, and as it passed the rear end of the north-bound train it blew into the door of the smoking-car. There it was found by the baggage-master.

Not Arguing.

The person who feels like saying, "Let us keep silence, that I may have the talk all to myself," would fain reduce conversation to an entirely one-sided affair.

The London Daily News says that the late Mr. Charles Keene, the artist of Punch, used to describe, with a great delight, the method of a certain man whom he called "a pot-house Ruskin."

This person was sitting with a friend in an inn parlor, and was haranguing the other man on matters in general. Finally the friend ventured mildly to interpose an objection. The speaker drew himself up with much dignity.

"I ain't a-arguing with you," said he. "I'm a-telling you!"

Four boxes rule the world—the cartridge box, the ballot box, the jury box, and last, but not least, the feminine hat box.

Mosby Men to Get $2,000,000.

A press dispatch:

DENVER, Col., Feb. 12.

Colonel John S. Mosby, the famous Confederate guerilla, stated to-day there were only about 100 of his men surviving to divide the $2,000,000 left them by Baron Robert von Massow of the German army.

"I have no official news of the bequest but have heard the report," said Colonel Mosby. "At no time did I have more than 400 men in my battalion. I preferred a small body of picked men who could be handled. The fact that I dodged about for two years, chased by 200,000 men, seems to vindicate my judgment.

"De Wet in South Africa is doing the same thing. It will take a million men to catch him. There are only 100 survivors of my command, but when the money comes I'll venture that I will find that I had an army of 100,000.

"Von Massow was a big, dashing fellow who had been in the Prussian army. I gave him an honorable discharge after he was treacherously shot in the back in Fairfax county, Virginia, by an officer whom he had captured. He recovered, however, and served in the Austrian and Franco-Prussian wars."

Colonel Mosby is a resident of San Francisco, and the Denver dispatch says that he was on the way to Virginia to visit his daughters. Ex-County Clerk Wm. L. Hunter was Mosby's lieutenant, or second in command. According to our recollection, Mr. Hunter's well written account of the Massow incident does not say that he recovered after being shot by an officer who had called for quarters and surrendered. Nevertheless, we hope that the $2,000,000 legacy may turn out to be a fact.

Under caption of "Snowfall Bulletin—No. 1" the Climate and Crop Service of the Weather Bureau has published some interesting facts. From the volume of data presented we can, however, quote only the following:

"A large number of reports have been received in California giving snowfall data up to the end of January, 1901. Since these reports were received a succession of storms crossing the southern portion of California has materially altered the condition existing at the end of January. This will be shown in a snowfall bulletin for February. It is enough to remark here that not for many years past has the snowfall been so heavy in Central and Southern California and the outlook for an abundant supply of water so promising. The heavy rains seem to have amply filled all reservoirs. For the whole State not only is there a fair supply of ground water, but there will be ample surface supply in rivers and reservoirs for the coming summer months. Up to the present time there has not been a very large run off from melting snow. In the Sierras the snow appears to be well packed, and there have been no marked thaws."

The Santa Fe company has gained control of the California Eastern railway, which will be extended from Manvel, in San Bernardino county, to Goodsprings, Nevada, and ultimately be made a "through line" to Salt Lake. The road has its initial point at Blake, a station on the Santa Fe Pacific, about 35 miles from the California and Inyo county border line. It runs almost due north 30 miles, and the extension to Goodsprings will be 30 miles more. It will thus pass about 65 miles east of Resting Springs, which is in the southeastern corner of this county. There seems to be little doubt of the intention of the Santa Fe to beat out the Clark road to Utah. On the other side, according to the Los Angeles Herald, a manager of the Clark road said that the extension of the California Eastern would in no way interfere with the larger project. "Our line has not been surveyed, and there has even been no reconnoisance made of the territory as yet. Even if we should be forced to cross the proposed line, which I do not believe, it would not interfere with our road, which will be built just the same."

The Assembly Committee on Irrigation has passed favorably upon Melick's constitutional amendment No. 22, which proposes to do away with riparian rights and put the water of all streams under public control. The amendment is as follows:

"The water of all streams shall forever remain subject to public control. Beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure and the limit of all rights to water. The right to water for irrigation vests in the user and becomes appurtenant to the land irrigated. Water for irrigation is hereby declared to be a natural want."

The amendment is submitted in the form of a new section, to be known as "Section 37, Article 14, of the Constitution of the State of California." Laws under the same constitutional provision are said to be working well in Colorado and Wyoming.

Assessors of San Joaquin valley counties have met and agreed to make for 1901 the following uniform rate of assessment on stock and grain:

Range horses, $10 to $15; average work horses, $25 to $30; average mules $35; American cows, $25; average stock cattle, $15; beef cattle, $25; calves, $5 to $10; sheep—fat wethers, $3; ewes and stock sheep, $3; lambs, 75c.; bucks, $5; hogs, $3 per 100 pounds. Uniform rates for grain were adopted, somewhat conditional upon market values on the first Monday in March: Wheat, $10; barley, $8: rye, $8; corn, $12; grain hay, $5; alfalfa, $3. The assessment of bees was fixed at $3 a stand.

W. H. Adams, a gentleman thoroughly informed as to the California oil industry, was in town for several days during the week, consulting land matters and the county records. Mr. Adams and associates have located 11520 acres of oil claims around and near Haiwai Meadows, where he says the indications appear as favorable as in any part of the Kern county fields.

The Valentine Social given by the Woman's Auxiliary of the C. P. Church of Bishop, last Thursday evening, was largely attended and was a great success financially and socially. The program, which consisted of tableaux, charades, character songs and drills, interspersed with music by the Concert Band, was especially characterized by its uniqueness and happy adaptation to the celebration of an evening devoted to St. Valentine.

Chinatown has been in the throes of the most extravagant New Year celebration that the Independence contingency of pigtails has experienced. The Heathen Chinee are a queer set. The compass of the Chinese points south. His left hand is the place of honor. He keeps out of step when walking with you. He thinks it polite te ask your age and income. The Chinese shakes his own hand instead of yours. He whitens his boots instead of blackening them. He rides with his heels in the stirrup instead of his toes. He laughs on receiving bad news, in order to deceive evil spirits. Often he throws away the fruit of the melon and eats the seeds. His women folks are often seen in trousers, accompanied by men in gowns. He burned fifteen thousand firecrackers and bombs here in the last three days, driving away devils. His favorite present to a parent is a coffin. But the most calamitous thing about the perverse race is that they won't all die and stay dead.

The First.

On the 13th instant there was filed in the County Clerk's office the articles of incorporation of the pioneer Inyo county oil company. It certifies (1) that the name of said corporation shall be the Owens Lake Oil and Mining Company; (2) that the purposes for which it is formed are oil mining, construction of pipe lines, roads, railroads, telephone and telegraph lines, refining and manufacturing of oil, to acquire by purchase or otherwise water rights and privileges, the stocks and bonds of other corporations, mineral and other lands; to buy, sell, lease, mortgage, hypothecate or otherwise dispose of said lands, stocks or bonds, and water rights and privileges, and to do all and everything that may be necessary in the conduct of a general oil and development of mineral land business within the State of California. The principal place of business is Bakersfield. Directors—A. B. Hoyt, F. S. Hoyt, E. C. Holloway, F. C. St. Clair, C. A. Nelson, all of Bakersfield. Capital stock, $750,000, in 750,000 shares of the par value of $1, of which 300,800 are subscribed for. Mr. Holloway was in Independence last Monday, looking up some titles, etc. He stated to our reporter that the Owens Lake Oil and Mining Company is backed by Pennsylvania capital and that complete oil prospecting machinery will be on the ground in April next.

Cyrus B. Rawson.

A few minutes after 5 o'clock on the evening the 16th instant, last Saturday, C. B. Rawson died at his home on the ranch near Bishop. He had been riding with the cattle during the day, coming home in normal health. When supper was called a few minutes later he declined going and stated that having had a late dinner he was not hungry. The other members of the family went to supper, leaving Mr. Rawson sitting in his chair and reading. About fifteen minutes afterwards Mr. Kendricks returned to the room and found Mr. Rawson dead in his chair. The newspaper was still in his hand and his glasses on his nose, showing that he had passed away without a struggle.

He was a native of New York, aged 74 years and 10 days. He came to Inyo in 1884, and with brains and capital at once made his presence known. His well known business enterprises were of the creative, beneficial order—of a character that meant lasting improvement of the valley's real and future industrial interests; that enhanced permanent public betterment and encroached upon none. He was in every way a square man, for whom all felt and showed respect because he deserved it, and the people sincerely regret his death.

Iddings.

Referring to the recent death of H. A. Iddings, some account of which was given by this paper last week, a San Francisco paper says:

"Iddings was division superintendent of the various electric lines operated in the western portion of the city, with headquarters at the Turk and Fillmore street car house. He was superintendent of the Metropolitan electric road that was built in 1892 and operated for about three years as an independent line. When that road was absorbed by the Market street railway Iddings was placed at the head of all the electric lines running in the Western Addition. The news of his death was a painful surprise to his friends and fellow railroad men here. Iddings came to this city in 1892 from Omaha. He was born in Ohio and was about forty-five years of age."

Jesus Carrasco has returned to Lone Pine, very much the worse of wear on account of his trip with Mr. Iddings and is under treatment by Dr. Woodin. Iddings was buried at Ballarat, and, according to Carrasco, appeared to be rattled throughout the journey. The snow that they encountered at Wild Rose was an unprecedented thing. But imagine the contrast between the vast silence of Death Valley and the hurly-burly of street railroads.

EDITOR INDEPENDENT—It does seem strange that a dispatch should come to me dated at Seattle, Washington, Feb 16, 1901, instructing me to embalm the body of Mr. Iddings [the dispatch reached me eight days after his death] and ship the body East, but gave no address to ship to. Some one must have imposed upon the sender—C. A. Raser,—as I am not an undertaker and know nothing of the process of embalming.

ROB'T STEWART.

Deceased was a native of New York, aged about 53 years. He came to this county in 1892, and was foreman of several of the principal mines. He led and conducted the hazardous work of rescuing Frank Fitzgerald from the cave in the Modock mine. He was a thorough miner, well respected by all.

Gold Bars in Evidence.

Success is chronicled for the Black Eagle mine and mill—the Barnes & Anderson property. Yesterday morning the owners, and operators as well, shipped to the Carson mint two bars of gold, 855 fine, of the value of $2316. Such is the product of a sixteen days' (daylight) run of their new 2 stamp Hendy mill, and rounds out shipments since last December aggregating something over $5,000. The property is now evidently beyond the "prospect" stage, as the following summarized statement of the development work will show: The main shaft is 210 feet in depth; at 40 feet a drift runs 245 feet on the northward trend, and at a level 90 feet lower a drift extends along the ledge for 115 feet. The ore ranges from 2 to 4 feet in width. The mining work is in charge of Geo. Thorpe, one of the best miners in the country. We do not know what this blocked out body of ore will sample, but the results quoted seem to signify that.

A new Standard concentrator, an approved machine manufactured at Los Angeles, is now at the Independence railroad station, which will soon be installed at the mill. It is for the purpose of saving the sulphurets in the tailings. These will be shipped elsewhere for gold extraction, and make a recovery of value to the amount of $20 per day.

The draft horse industry is certainly in a healthy condition, and the breeder of this type of animal can depend upon good profits for years to come. A number of notable sales have been made on the Chicago market during the past three months. Six matched Clydesdale geldings sold for $3600; a pair of gelding of same breed sold for $700, many individual sales running from $200 to $350. Of Percherons a pair of geldings sold for $700; a second pair brought $675; eighteen head averaged $250, and seventeen head averaged $233.

Painful Periods

are overcome by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Fifty thousand happy women testify to this in grateful letters to Mrs. Pinkham.

Menstruation is a severe strain on a woman's vitality. If it is painful something is wrong which will promptly set right; if excessive or irregular write to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., for advice.

Evidence abounds that Mrs. Pinkham's advice and medicine have for many years been helping women to be strong. No other advice is so unvaryingly accurate, no other medicine has such a record of cure.

He Knew.

They met in front of the Read House. One was fat and black, with a wonderful expanse of mouth and a voice like a couple of fog horns. The other was black and lean and weazened.

Said the fat black to the lean black, "Why dean' you 'gratulate me, Brudder Johnsing?"

"What fer I 'gratulate you?" said Brudder Johnsing.

"What fer you 'gratulate me! Why, man, kase I done mar'd de Widder Jeff'son."

"You is—you dun mar'd de Widder Jeff'son?" squeaked out the lean one.

"I sho' is dun mar'd dat lady," said the fat one, with an air of great satisfaction.

"Den I does 'gratulate you wif my whole heart; I sho' does."

The two separated, when the lean one turned to a knot of white gentlemen who had been interested and amused auditors of the conversation and remarked:

"Yas, I 'gratulate him! Haw, haw, haw! He, he! I sho' does. He's de wus en'my I has, an I cert'inly 'gratulates. Why, boss," he said confidentially, singling out one of the spectators, "I wus mar'd to dat 'oman fer a year myself. Yas, I sho' do 'gratulate dat man." And he moved off toward Market street, chuckling and muttering to himself.—Chattanooga News.

Wouldn't Be Fooled Again.

A shepherd once, to prove the quickness of his dog, which was lying before the fire in the house where we were talking, said to me in the middle of a sentence concerning something else, "I'm thinking, sir, the cow is in the potatoes."

Though he purposely laid no stress on these words and said them in a quiet, unconcerned tone of voice, the dog, who appeared to be asleep, immediately jumped up and, leaping through the open window, scrambled up to the turf roof of the house, from which he could see the potato field. He then, not seeing the cow there, ran and looked into the barn where she was and, finding that all was right, came back to the house.

After a short time the shepherd said the same words again, and the dog repeated his lookout, but on the false alarm being the third time given the dog got up and, wagging his tail, looked his master in the face with so comical an expression of interrogation that he could not help laughing aloud at him, on which, with a slight growl, he laid himself down in his warm corner with an offended air, as if determined not to be made a fool of again.—Exchange.

A Cold Weather Joke.

A business man came down to his office on a winter morning when it was bitterly cold.

"Whew, how cold it is!" he said to one of the clerks. "Just shut that safe, if you please."

The clerk obeyed, with a puzzled look. Then when he could restrain his curiosity no longer he asked:

"Excuse me, sir, but why did you tell me to shut the safe?"

"Why," replied his employer, with a sly chuckle, "there are a good many drafts in that safe."—London Fun.

THE MAN OF FALLEN FORTUNE.

Some Things That Seem to Make Him Less Lonesome than He Was.

"I have before me—I wish I hadn't—" said the man of fallen fortunes, "three pawn tickets. As I look these tickets over they reveal to me, to-day, something that I had never thought of before; their new significance I find in a consideration of the numbers upon them.

"The first of these tickets, issued late in the month of February, is numbered forty-eight hundred and odd; clearly, in the first two months of the year—the tickets being numbered in annual series—there had been issued at this establishment tickets at the rate of upward of 2,000 a month, and this is a place where they take nothing but diamonds and watches, and jewelry, and paintings, and that sort of thing; no overcoats and miscellaneous truck, but only articles of intrinsic value.

"Thus, apparently, that is to say according to the number of tickets issued, there had come here to pledge articles of this sort, within two months, nearly 5,000 persons. To look at it in just this way, however, would be more or less misleading, because it might be that more than one ticket had been issued to the same person, on goods pledged at different times. Still the persons depositing pledges here in less than two months would certainly number hundreds; it might be that they would count into the thousands.

"My next number, of a date at about the middle of March, is sixty-four hundred and something. Observe the ratio of issue considerably more than 2,000 tickets a month, My third ticket, dated early in December, is numbered twenty-eight thousand some hundreds and odd. The increase had continued throughout the year, but what impressed me most was the total. I have, of course, in my three tickets no sufficient data from which to deduce definitely the course of the business through the year; as to whether there were months or seasons in which more pledges were offered than in others, and so on, though my own February and March numbers, as far as they go, would seem to indicate that the business was pretty uniformly distributed. But the total, when for the first time I came to realize it, was impressive.

"Out of the whole number of tickets I have three. Even if each of the persons who have pledged things here should have as many, still the number of those who had brought things here to pledge, in the course of a full year (my twenty-eight-thousand-and-odd ticket was dated in early December) would exceed 10,000! Surely I had company. Once it had seemed to me, with my pawn ticket in my pocket, that I was outside the pale; but, bless our dear hearts and souls, we are not quite alone; there are others, only they do not, any more than men do their hearts, pin their pawn tickets on their sleeves."

BITS FOR BOOKWORMS

Gertrude Atherton's novel, "Senator North," has been incorporated in the German Tauchnitz edition of English books. It is said that a well-known English playwright has proposed to her to dramatize the book.

Mary Johnston, whose second novel, "To Have and to Hold," is now in its 270th thousand, has almost completed a third, which, under the title of "Audrey," will appear as a serial before being published in book form.

The book on Charles Dickens written by his secretary, Charles Dolby—who died in extreme destitution recently—is said by Dickens' daughter to be the best and truest picture of her father yet produced. It is called "Charles Dickens as I Knew Him."

A number of short stories by William Waldorf Astor that have appeared from time to time in the English magazines have now been collected, and will shortly appear in book form in this country and in England under the title of "Pharaoh's Daughter and Other Stories."

It is said that Jeannette L. Gilder is atempting a rather novel scheme in the dramatization of popular novels. Instead of basing her forthcoming play on one story, she has drawn inspiration from two. The two books are "Sky Pilot" and "Black Rock," by Charles Gordon, a Canadian clergyman, who writes under the pseudonym of "Ralph Connor." The play will be entitled "The Sky Pilot of Black Rock."

So Friendly.

After they had kissed each other and each had disposed of a chocolate to show that there was no ill feeling between them, the blonde said:

"So Mabel is married?"

"So I've heard," returned the brunette.

"Nice girl," ventured the blonde.

"Oh, yes," returned the brunette.

"I wouldn't say a word against her for the world."

"Neither would I. How do you suppose she ever got him?"

"I'm sure I don't know. Do you?"

"No; I would give anything to know."

"So would I. It certainly wasn't her beauty."

"Oh, no!"

"Or her cleverness."

"The idea is absurd."

"I can't understand it at all. They say she was married by the registrar first and afterward at the church."

"I shouldn't wonder. She naturally wanted to make awfully sure of him."

"Of course. It is the only way she could keep him. But I am glad she has caught some one. Mabel is a dear girl, and it would be cruel to say anything against her."

"Indeed it would. I wouldn't do it for the world!"

"Neither would I."—New York Press.

MEDICAL EXAMINER

Of the U. S. Treasury Recommends Peruna.

Dr. Llewellyn Jordan.

Dr. Llewellyn Jordan, Medical Examiner of U. S. Treasury Department, graduate of Columbia College, and who served three years at West Point, has the following to say of Peruna:

"Allow me to express my gratitude to you for the benefit derived from your wonderful remedy. One short month has brought forth a vast change and I now consider myself a well man after months of suffering. Fellow sufferers, Peruna will cure you."

Catarrh is a systemic disease curable only by systemic treatment. A remedy that cures catarrh must aim directly at the depressed nerve centers. This is what Peruna does. Peruna immediately invigorates the nerve-centers, which give vitality to the mucous membranes. Then catarrh disappears. Then catarrh is permanently cured.

Peruna cures catarrh wherever located. Peruna is not a guess nor an experiment—it is an absolute scientific certainty. Peruna has no substitutes—no rivals. Insist upon having Peruna.

A free book written by Dr. Hartman, on the subject of catarrh in its different phases and stages, will be sent free to any address by The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio.

Seeds that Surely Grow.

The cost of seeds compared with the value of the crop is so small that a few cents saved by buying second rate seeds will amount to many dollars lost when the harvest is gathered. Farmers have found out by many costly failures what a risky thing it is to buy seeds without being pretty sure that they are reliable and true to name. The latest catalogue of the seed house of D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., is a reminder that thousands of farmers in the United States and Canada have pinned their faith to the reputation of this great firm. During a business career approaching half a century in time Ferry's seeds have won an annual increase in popularity, which is perhaps the best evidence that they grow and give satisfaction. Ferry's Seed Annual for 1901 is a useful guide in selecting seeds for the farm, the truck garden and the flower garden. It is sent free on application.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that can not be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

LOTS OF FAKE HISTORIES.

Book Writers Have a Mania for Audacious and Pretentious Works.

"If I ever get to Congress," said a man in a book store yesterday, "I am going to introduce a bill for the suppression of fake historians. It will provide that any of them caught plying their craft shall be sentenced to six months, twice a year on the rock pile until they promise to be good." "What do you mean by fake historians?" asked another customer. "I thought there was more or less faking in all history, except, of course, historical novels." "May be so," said the first man, "but what I had reference to was the Johnny-on-the-spot history that pops up nowadays the minute anything big happens. Take this Chinese muddle, for instance. It began last June, didn't it? Well, that's only a few months ago, yet how many histories or historical works bearing directly or indirectly on the subject do you think have been issued? Half a dozen? Bah! Here's one catalogue in which I find twenty-eight, and I dare say that doesn't represent half the sum total. A good many of them, I admit, are works of real merit, but they are put forward under false pretenses. They are books that were written carefully some years ago and are now 'brought up to date' by a little faked appendix. They treat of the Chinese situation from a viewpoint which was all right at the time, but is now completely changed. Hence they are misleading.

"But here's something a great deal worse. It purports to be a history of the recent complications, and is published in excellent style by a very respectable house. I read it the other night and was amazed at its audacity. Instead of being such a logical presentation of facts as we have a right to expect from a work making any pretentions to historical method, it is a clumsy hodge-podge of newspaper clippings, pitch-forked together in any old fashion to make a given number of pages, and most of them several years old. From the chapter headings one would suppose that it contained information of real value, and I turned at once to the part dealing with the Chinese army and navy. It proved to be a newspaper article that I first read directly after the war between China and Japan. Not a vessel it named is now in service. It is easy to say, of course, that the fellow who is fool enough to buy half-baked histories deserves to be humbugged, but the average man hasn't time to think the matter over in advance. What I have said applies also to the snap-shot 'lives' that appear whenever a personage of prominence dies. In these progressive times the biographer can actually beat the embalmer."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

COURTESY IN ONE'S HOME.

Observe Society's Rules and Children Will Never Be Ill at Ease.

When we read of court functions in foreign lands we notice that precedence is a thing determined by arbitrary laws, and should we spend a season in Washington we would learn that there are certain conventional rules which govern society and which cannot be violated by any one, from the lowest to the highest.

Precedence is an anomaly in the simple life of the ordinary home, yet it is an open question whether the cheerful contentment of the simplest household would not be increased if there were more formality in the daily intercourse of parents and children. Politeness would prevent much friction, for it is inconsistent with politeness to squabble, to say disagreeable things, to be brutally candid. Perhaps we do not half consider how much politeness saves us from as we go about among our friends.

In home conversation precedents as to right of way should be with the elders, says Good Housekeeping. Father and mother, grown-up brothers and sisters, guests should be allowed to express themselves and little people should not be suffered either to interrupt or to carry on their talk in a high key so that the older persons can hardly hear themselves speak.

One finds in otherwise well-bred circles an amazing license accorded to the children, in their continual breaking in with queries or with information about their own matters, nobody taking notice that they are learning to trample on others by the practice of speaking first and speaking loudest. When mother comes into a room, Hubert and Harriet should see that she has a chair. I can think of nothing ruder than the figure of a girl say 10, 12 or 13 years, calmly ensconsed in the most comfortable chair in the house, while her mother, or her father for that matter, looks about in vain for as desirable a seat.

Boys are, of course, taught to rise and give a seat to any lady who enters a room, also to rise and remain standing till a woman is seated, but the rule is often in abeyance to their own mothers and sisters. You may enter it on your records as a rule without exception, that no one will ever be at ease in society who fails in the little daily amenities in the home.

Only as we are most careful to insist on perfect courtesy in our home life, can we expect that our children shall appear to advantage when they step on the larger world-stage beyond their own doors.

New Russian Coal Fields.

In the immediate neighborhood of the city of Tchwartschovsk, in the Caucasus, a coal field extending over more than thirty miles has recently been discovered. The coal is said to be of a first-class quality, and a syndicate, with Prince Cantacuzene at the head, has already acquired the right of exploitation. The place where the veins occur is only twenty miles from the Black Sea, and railway as well as water communication can easily be rendered available. It is reported that work will soon be started.

THE BAND PLAYED "DIXIE."

And Sousa Won the Hearts of the People at Fayetteville.

When North Carolina celebrated its centenary, the Marine band was ordered to Fayetteville to participate in the ceremonies, said Bandmaster Sousa. The little southern town was much interested in the advent of the "president's band," and the prevailing opinion was that "Dixie" would be tabooed music with us. Before the exercises a local committee waited upon me and intimated that "Dixie" was a popular melody in that vicinity.

"Of course," said the spokesman, "we don't want you to play anything you don't want to, but please remember, sir, that we are very fond of 'Dixie' here."

Bowing gravely, I thanked the committee for their interest in my programme, but left them completely in the dark as to whether I intended to play the loved song of the south or not.

The ceremonies opened with a patriotic address by Governor Fowle lauding the glories of the American flag, and naturally the only appropriate music to such a sentiment was "The Star Spangled Banner," which the crowd patriotically cheered.

The tone of the succeeding oration was equally fervid, but the speaker enlarged upon the glories of the commonwealth whose one hundredth anniversary was being celebrated. The orator sat down, and there was a momentary pause, and then as I raised my baton the strains of "Dixie" fell upon the delighted ears of the thousands round the platform.

The unexpected had happened, and such a shout as went up from that throng I have never heard equaled. Hats were tossed in the air, gray haired men embraced, and for a few minutes a jubilant pandemonium reigned supreme. During the rest of our stay in Fayetteville the repertory of the Marine band was on this order: "Yankee Doodle," "Dixie," "Star Spangled Banner," "Dixie," "Red, White and Blue," "Dixie."—Youth's Companion.

His Words Were Prophetic.

"Making a photograph of James Harper was the most startling experience of my life," says George G. Rockwood, the New York photographer. "In the year 1869 it transpired that no good picture existed of the four Harper brothers, and it was determined that they should sit to the same photographer and have a uniform series of pictures made. A very successful photograph of Fletcher brought them all.

"James Harper was the second to sit for me, and as he was passing out of the door of my studio he saw a portrait of Rev. Dr. Muhlenburgh, the founder of St. Luke's hospital. We entered into a brief discussion of the mighty results of the well and wisely directed efforts of one man as illustrated in the establishment of this beneficent institution. He said, 'If anything should happen to me, I believe I should like to be taken to St. Luke's hospital, for there organized, practiced skill would perhaps be paramount to even the tender care and love one gets at home.'

"His words were prophetic. After declining his warm invitation for me to ride with him he left the gallery, I think, near 2 o'clock in the afternoon. About 5 o'clock a gentleman rushed into the reception room and asked, 'Was James Harper here today?' 'Yes.' 'Did he sit for a photograph?' 'Yes, and here is the negative—a superb one.' 'Thank God! He was thrown from his carriage this afternoon and now lies dying in St. Luke's hospital.'"

How Centuries ago, St. Vitus' Dance Derived Its Name—The Old and New Way of Treating This Disease.

From Republican Traveler, Arkansas City, Kan.

Centuries ago it was believed that by a pilgrimage to some shrine of St. Vitus, persons afflicted by irregular and uncontrollable muscular movements could be cured, and that is how this disease, which usually affects children between five and fifteen years old, came to be called St. Vitus' dance.

The modern way to successfully treat this disease is within reach of every household, as is shown in the following experience of Karl A. Wagner, the eleven-year-old son of George Wagner, 515 9th St., Arkansas City, Kansas.

"Over a year ago," says Mr. Wagner, "my son began to have twitching in his right side, which rapidly became worse. We called in our family physician and he told us that Karl had St. Vitus' dance. For over five months he was under the doctor's care and instead of getting better he continued to fail.

"At last he became so bad that when sitting at the table to his meals we had to strap his right arm to his side to keep him from knocking the dishes off the table. His tongue became so paralyzed that he could talk only in gutterals. We could not understand a word he said. His right leg hung limp and could be pushed back and forth as if hung on a swivel. He became very thin.

"We had fully made up our mind that the disease could not be cured, and that if Karl lived any length of time, he would become an invalid.

"We had about given up all hope, when one day a lady said to my wife, if you will give him Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, they will cure him, as I have a daughter, twelve years old, who has been afflicted in the same way and the pills cured her.

"I sent at once and bought a box of the pills and used them according to directions, and before using half of them I noticed a change for the better in his condition, and after using all of the pills, I was so well pleased with the result that I bought two more boxes, and by the time he had used five boxes, the disease disappeared.

"The cure has been effectual and permanent, and I feel satisfied that no other medicine could have effected such marvelous results We feel rejoiced over the restoration of our son, and cannot help but feel that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are the most remarkable medicine on the market." Mrs. Wagner, who was present, fully endorsed all the words of her husband.

When the Hair Falls Out accompanied by mucous patches in the mouth, eruptions on the skin, sore throat, copper colored splotches, swollen glands, aching muscles and bones, the disease is making rapid headway, and far worse symptoms will follow unless the blood is promptly and effectually cleansed of this violent destructive poison.

S. S. S. is the only safe and infallible cure for this disease, the only antidote for this specific poison. It cures the worst cases thoroughly and permanently.

My Condition Could Have Been No Worse. In the fall of 1897 I contracted Blood Poison. I tried three doctors, but their treatment did me no good; I was getting worse all the time; my hair came out, ulcers appeared in my throat and mouth, my body was almost covered with copper colored splotches and offensive sores. I suffered severely from rheumatic pains in my shoulders and arms. My condition could have been no worse; only those afflicted as I was can understand my sufferings. I had about lost all hope of ever being well again when I decided to try S. S. S., but must confess I had little faith left in any medicine. After taking the third bottle I noticed a change in my condition. This was truly encouraging, and I determined to give S. S. S. a thorough trial. From that time on the improvement was rapid; S. S. S. seemed to have the disease completely under control; the sores and ulcers healed and I was soon free from all signs of the disorder; I have been strong and healthy ever since.

EXPECTANCY.

Some day, some day 'twill all come right.
The tangled skein will all unwind,
And we will grasp the colors bright
And leave the somber threads behind.
The sun is slow, and rest is sweet,
Yet fears draw round us when it sets,
And sorrow comes with winged feet,
And joy but heralds new regrets.

E'en while we taste, sweet drafts will turn
To litterness that hurts us sore;
We learn to love and, loving, learn
To feel the loved one's loss the more,
And yet, when "reason's" light grows pale
There shines through darkness still a ray
Of faith untaught which cannot fail
And leads us onward to some day.

A GLIMPSE OF TURNER.

Introducing an Incident That Suggested One of His Great Pictures.

It was a friend of Ruskin's mother, Mrs. John Simon, who told the story. She was traveling by night in the early days of the Great Western railway from Plymouth to London:

"When I had taken off my cloak and smoothed my plumes and generally settled myself, I looked up to see the most wonderful eyes I ever saw steadily, luminously, clairvoyantly, kindly, paternally looking at me. The hat was over the forehead, the mouth and chin buried in the brown velvet coat collar of the brown greatcoat. Well, we went on, and the storm went on more and more, until we reached Bristol, to wait ten minutes. My old gentleman rubbed the side window with his coat cuff in vain, attacked the center window, again in vain, so blurred and blotted was it with the torrents of rain. A moment's hesitation and then:

"'Young lady, would you mind my putting down this window?'

"'Oh, no, not at all.'

"'You may be drenched, you know.'

"'Never mind, sir.'

"Immediately down goes the window, out go the old gentleman's head and shoulders, and there they stay for I suppose nearly nine minutes; then he drew them in, and I said:

"'Oh, please let me look.'

"'Now, you will be drenched.' But he half opened the window for me to see. Such a sight, such a chaos of elemental and artificial lights and noises, I never saw or heard or expect to see or hear. He drew up the window as we moved on and then leaned back with closed eyes for I dare say ten minutes, then opened them and said:

"'Well?'

"I said, 'I've been "drenched," but it's worth it.'

"He nodded and smiled and again took to his steady but quite inoffensive perusing of my face."

The whole letter is too long for quotation, but this is the sequel:

"The next year, I think, going to the academy, I turned at once, as I always did, to see what Turners there were.

"Imagine my feelings—'Rain, Steam and Speed. Great Western Railway, June the —, 1843.'

"I had found out who the 'seeing' eyes belonged to. As I stood looking at the picture I heard a mawkish voice behind me say:

"'There, now, just look at that. Ain't it just like Turner? Who ever saw such a ridiculous conglomeration?'

"I turned very quietly round and said: "'I did. I was in the train that night, and it is perfectly and wonderfully true,' and walked quietly away."—From Last Chapter of Ruskin's "Praeterita."

Uncountable Moves In Chess.

Some one with a head for figures has recently attempted to calculate the number of moves on the chessboard. He starts with the fact that each player has 20 possible moves from which he must select his first move. He then tells us that the number of possible ways of playing the first four moves only, on each side would be 318,979,564,000.

If then, any one were to play without cessation at the rate of one set a minute, it would take him more than 600,000 years to go through them all. The number of ways of playing the first ten moves on each side is 169,518,829,100,544,000,000,000,000,000. These figures are probably in defect, rather than in excess, of the actual number. On their basis, however, and considering the population of the whole world to be 1,483,000,000, more than 247,000,000,000 would be needed to go through them all, even if every man, woman and child on the face of the globe played without cessation for that enormous period at the rate of one set per minute and no set was repeated.

Ancient Bank Notes.

Among the many products of civilization which were familiar to the Chinese many centuries before they came into use in Europe may be reckoned bank notes. There is in the possession of "The Old Lady In Threadneedle Street" a specimen supposed to be one of the oldest extant, dating from the fourteenth century of our era.

It is now proved, however, that paper money was issued in China as early as 807 A. D. These securities closely resembled the famous French assignats in being based upon the estates of the kingdom. The Bank of Stockholm claims to have been the first western institution to adopt a paper currency, but the Bank of England must have followed very close with its £20 notes, which were issued in 1696.—Bankers' Monthly.

How Hussars Got the Name.

Hussars do not derive their names from any sort of a warcry or cheer. The name is from the Magyar word houtzar, meaning the twentieth. Hussars, as cavalry soldiers, were first confined to Hungary. In 1445 the crown passed a law compelling the peasants to supply one man out of every 20 of their number, and that man a horseman, to the army of the state. The first hussars were recruited from the inhabitants of the immense Hungarian plains—strong, hardy fellows, with sinews supple as steel, who spent their life in the saddle.

British Pensions.

An officer who loses a limb or eye at once receives a sum equivalent to a year's pay and the price of an artificial limb. A year later he may be granted a permanent annual pension, graduated according to his rank. A lieutenant general receives £400, a major general £350, a colonel £300, a major £200, a captain £100 and a subaltern £70.—Scottish American.

Remedy For Poison.

It is said that raw eggs and milk are a sure remedy for poison of any kind taken into the stomach. This is information that may do a deal of good if remembered and cannot possibly be productive of any harm.

ONE OF SOTHERN'S PRANKS.

An Acrobat's Leap That Won Applause and a Discharge as Well.

The elder Sothern once was acting the hero in a romantic play which required his leaping from a window in a tall tower to the stage below, where he alighted on a mattress behind a wooden rock and immediately made off rapidly into a forest. One night he hurt his ankle and vowed he would leap no more. Accordingly, the next day his manager hired a professional circus performer to do the actual leap, while the actor should slip back under cover of part of the tower wall and descend by a safe but unromantic ladder to his dressing room.

The manager provided the circus man with a costume precisely like Sothern's and sent him to the theater to practice. The man made the jump and set up a loud complaint.

"What's the row?" inquired a young member of the company who happened to be at the playhouse.

"Why, look here," exclaimed the professional, "this 'ere drop is too easy. A man with a wooden leg and two glass eyes could do it. Now, if they'd let me turn two somersaults in the air as I came down I wouldn't make no fuss."

"Capital!" cried the actor. "Do it."

"You think the old cove wouldn't mind?" said the athlete doubtfully.

"Mind!" returned the young player. "Why, he'd be tickled to death and probably raise your salary as well."

That evening when the part of the performance was reached wherein the hero took leave of the heroine Sothern was gratified to see his substitute crouching in the shadow of the casement ready to leap.

"Love, good night—good night!" cried Sothern.

"Stay!" pleaded the heroine, clinging around his neck. "Stay! That leap is death!"

"Nay, nay, sweet, 'tis honor. I leap, 'tis true, but what in my heart doth bear me up? Thine image, love! Good night—good night!"

He kissed her frantically on the forehead, tore himself from her embrace and rushed across the open space into the shadow. "Jump!" he hissed between his teeth. Out into the air shot the circus man, whirled around twice like the flywheel of a steam engine and lit like a bird on the highest point of the rock. The applause came in thunders. The man bowed stiffly and walked off into the wings with his arms folded. The acrobat's salary, however, was not raised, and that was his last appearance at that theater.—London Telegraph.

VANDERBILT'S REVENGE.

He Sacrificed $60,000 to Get Even With Horseman Stone.

"Ever hear the story why the late W. H. Vanderbilt paid odd change for Maud S—that is, why the sum was $21,000 instead of, say, $20,000 or $25,000?" inquired a well known horseman. "There is an interesting story back of that which has never been printed, and as I had it from Mr. Vanderbilt himself I'll bet a red apple it is all right.

"The sum which Mr. Vanderbilt was to pay Captain George E. Stone of Cincinnati for Maud S was an even $20,000. Before the mare was delivered Captain Stone is supposed to have rued his bargain. Anyhow, he wrote to Mr. Vanderbilt that he had promised to give Bair, the trainer of Maud S, $1,000 as an honorarium, and he thought Mr. Vanderbilt ought to add this to what he was to pay. The presumption is that Stone thought this marking up of the price would break the bargain.

"One thousand dollars wasn't much for a man like Mr. Vanderbilt, but that little ruse made him just as mad as if it had taken the last cent he had on earth. But he was something of a David Harum himself and knew a good piece of horseflesh when he saw it, and when he sent Captain Stone his check for the mare it was for $21,000 instead of $20,000.

"That's part of the story, but only the least interesting. Afterward, when Captain Stone headed a syndicate to buy Maud S back from Mr. Vanderbilt and was willing to pay $100,000 for her, the big railroad man still remembered the $1,000 transaction, and the Cincinnati people could not have bought the mare if they had offered $1,000,000 for her.

"Of course, when Mr. Vanderbilt sold her to Robert Bonner for $40,000, when he had been offered $100,000, there was a good deal said about his desire to get the phenomenal trotter in the hands of a man who would take good care of her. The fact is that Mr. Vanderbilt was willing to sacrifice $60,000 to even up matters with Mr. Stone. And if this was expensive revenge for Mr. Vanderbilt it was even more expensive for Stone, for if he could have repurchased Maud S at that time he could have cleaned up $250,000 with her."—Boston Herald.

Courtesy.

Courtesy is getting to be more and more a thing of the past. Not only does the majority neglect the thousand and one little politenesses, but sneers and snarls at those who still delight to give the small evidences of breeding that smooth the way of life.

It has come to pass that men are ashamed to take off their hats when talking with ladies or when in an elevator filled with women because they are laughed at and have the accusation "affectation" hurled at them. When a man or boy comes into your office nowadays, he seldom takes off his hat or removes the cigar or cigarette from his lips. You might go in a hundred drawing rooms tomorrow and not see a gentleman arise at the entrance of a lady into the room.

All these are little things, but infractions of the great law that holds society together. If a man becomes careless in the little things, his carelessness soon extends to larger and more important things.—Kansas City Independent.

Broken Windows.

The breaking of windows is due to many causes, one of the most familiar of which, for instance, is found in the accidental throwing of balls against them in play. But a glazier said he thought that perhaps the most common cause of broken windows would be found in the settling of houses, with the result not of smashing out, as would often happen if something were thrown against the glass, but of cracking it. This would, however, amount to the same thing, a broken window.—New York Sun.

SICKENING CARGOES.

SUFFERINGS CAUSED TO SAILORS AT SEA BY THE SHIP'S LOAD.

Coffee Is Bad Enough, and Pine Lumber Is Still Worse, but the Fumes From Warm, Moist Sugar Are Enough to Kill an Ordinary Man.

It was in one of the little river front eating houses in Brooklyn frequented by sailors from the coasters which are loading or unloading. A big, powerful sailor who looked as if he had never in his life known what it was to be sick for a day entered and took a chair opposite a longshoreman who had already ordered and was waiting for his dinner. As the sailor was looking over the bill of fare with that critical and hesitant eye that characterizes Jack ashore from a long voyage with a discriminating sea appetite upon him, the waiter brought in a cup of steaming coffee and set it down before the longshoreman. As the odor of it reached the sailor's nostrils he bent upon the cup a gaze of concentrated disgust and hatred. Then he turned deadly pale, rose from his seat and staggered toward the door.

"Been drinking a little too much for your tonnage, mate?" asked the proprietor, helping him to the door.

"Haven't had a drop today," said the man huskily. "It's that coffee."

"What's the matter with the coffee?" asked the proprietor angrily. "There ain't any better coffee than that on the river front."

"That's all right," replied the sailor with an effort, "but I just got in off a coffee ship this morning."

"Oh," said the proprietor comprehendingly. "If that's the case, I'll fix you off in the corner, where you'll be all right."

A table was set for him far from the others, and there he ate his dinner in apparent peace. Now, there was in the eating house a landsman of an inquiring turn of mind who failed to understand the wherefore of all this, so he questioned the proprietor, who has been long on the river front and is himself a graduate from before the mast and has sailed in many waters of the world.

"Nothing queer about that," he said in response to the landsman's question. "He's been out on a coffee ship; that's all. He won't want to see or smell coffee for weeks, let alone taste it."

"Do they feed them nothing but coffee on the coffee ships?" asked the landsman in the innocence of his soul.

"Feed 'em? 'Tisn't the feed; it's the smell that knocks 'em. For a week or ten days it isn't bad; it fact, it's rather a pleasant smell, that of the green berry, but after that it begins to get on your mind. In damp weather, if it's a long voyage, it's something terrible.

"There's other cargoes," continued the ex-sailor, "that's just as bad. You might think guano was one of 'em, but it isn't. Guano's Rose of Sharon perfume compared to sugar. Didn't suppose there was any smell to sugar, eh? Well, you take it in a bowl and there ain't. But take a cargo of it and let it steam in a temperature of from 90 to 110, with plenty of damp to work it up, and I'd like to see what you'd think of it then. You get so mortal sick of the sweetness of it, which you smell and taste, too, with every breath, that you'd be glad to fill up with anything that would offset it, even if it was wormwood. I've seen the time I felt as if I could drink a gallon of vinegar flavored with lemon juice at a gulp. That voyage was a sufferer, sure enough. We couldn't live between decks at all, and we all berthed as near the stern rail as we could get and even put out the small boats when it was still and lay in them to get relief.

"When provisions had to be got out of the hold, the cook went down with jute bagging tied over his nose and mouth to keep out the fumes, but after a couple of trips he fainted, and they sent me in. Two descents laid me out. I thought I was going to die. In my time I've seen folks that were tolerable seasick, but all they did was a maiden's sigh to my performances. If it wasn't convulsions, it was so mighty near it that I thought I was gone and felt like I couldn't go too quick to suit myself. They brought me around with lime juice, but it was weeks after landing before I wanted any sweetening in mine.

"The fact is that in the tropics almost any cargo you have kind of tinges existence for you. Oil is pretty tough, particularly petroleum. A man'll dream of petroleum after he's associated with it for a month or so on shipboard. But pine lumber really takes the cake when it fairly gets into everything. I never happened to suffer much from that sort of cargo myself, but I saw a crew that came just as near death from too much pine resin as men can come and pull through.

"We were in port at Rio when a ship came in laden with pine lumber. More than that, the fool of a skipper had let somebody supply him with pine water butts. Well, the resin began to get into the water, and first they knew the crew was pretty well poisoned with it. Then they got so that they couldn't swallow the water at all, or if they did they couldn't hold it down a second. And there wasn't any other water aboard. They were in mighty great danger of dying of thirst with plenty of water aboard just because the old man was new to that kind of voyaging. Rio happened to be the nearest port, and, though it was far out of their course, they put for it as the only chance of saving their lives. I'd hate to see again such a looking lot as they were. They were dried out like mummies and so weak that I don't see how they ever worked the ship at all. When they got in, we thought at first it was black smallpox, they were such fearful looking objects. When they did get sweet water again, they drank till I thought they'd burst, and how they did fight when we tried to get the pannikins away for fear they'd kill themselves! Some of 'em died in the hospital from the effects. I never shipped on a pine loaded ship after seeing that."—New York Sun.

A Happy Day.

Two little London girls who had been sent by the kindness of the vicar's wife to have "a happy day in the country," narrating their experiences on their return, said:

"Oh, yes, mum; we did 'ave a 'appy day. We see two pigs killed and a gentleman buried."

VOICES OF GREAT ORATORS.

How They Controlled Them In Impassioned Speech.

Henry Clay's reputation as a great public speaker arose largely from his sonorous voice and well rounded periods. Thomas Corwin, who was a greater speaker than he, dealt more in humor, of which he was the most conspicuous master that ever appeared in American politics. He always thought, not without cause, that his very readiness to convulse an audience with laughter detracted from his fame and gave the solemn, sonorous speaker, like Clay, great advantage with the reputation makers.

Caleb B. Smith had a lisp in his speech, which, however, was scarcely distinguishable in the rapid fire of his clear, soprano utterances. Smith was not great on the printed page, but as a popular orator on the stump he had no superior and few equals. Cassius M. Clay roared like a railway speeding over a long trestle, but in the rumble his words were at a little distance indistinct. It was not so with Smith. As far as you could hear the ringing tones of his voice you could distinguish his words and follow the line of his thought, although he spoke with much greater rapidity than Clay. George W. Julian spoke slowly and distinctly. He was the best master of the weapons of irony and sarcasm the senate ever produced. A bitter word grew terrible as it fell from his lips.

D. W. Voorhees was the orator of lofty flight and startling simile. His voice could accommodate itself to every change of thought or mortification of feeling. He could strew flowers one moment or revel in the haunts of desolation and death in the next. His voice was his servant, and he was more the actor than the logician.

Morton was an image breaker. When other men wrought fanciful creations of frail materials, finished in beautiful patterns, his merciless logic, heightened by the wonderful depth and force of his voice, went crashing through them to make plain the truth which they had obscured.

The power of his voice was so great that when he used to read his keynote speeches, holding the sheets open in his hand before him, not one person in twenty of the thousands who heard him knew at the time or would afterward believe that he was reading a carefully prepared oration rather than speaking from the inspiration of the hour.—Indianapolis Press.

HE PLAYED ALL NIGHT.

A Funny Story About Camille Saint-Saens, the Composer.

Camille Saint-Saens, the brilliant French composer, an extremely nearsighted man, was at a large social gathering in Paris one evening when the host asked him to play something. He for a long time refused to do so; but, being earnestly pressed, he took his seat at the piano. His hair was tossed back, his eye gleamed with excitement. Now he would bend over the piano, then he would throw himself back, and all the while his fingers would run over the keys as he extemporized in the most brilliant fashion. The company were delighted.

After an hour pleasure gave place to weariness. Two hours afterward some of the guests began to leave. Their example quickly became contagious, and by degrees nobody remained in the room except the master of the house (the hostess had long since gone to bed).

Saint-Saens, more inspired and more tumultuous than ever, utterly unconscious of the incidents around him, played on as fast and as frenzied as ever. At last, about 2 a. m., seeing Saint-Saens playing with more ardor than ever, the master of the house, completely overcome with fatigue, became desperate and, laying his hand on the composer's shoulder, said, "I beg pardon, my dear sir, but pray are you not a little fatigued?"

Saint-Saens replied, without leaving the piano, "not in the least," and, to show how fresh he was, struck into a new improvisation with wilder enthusiasm than ever. The host gave up, stole out of the room and went to bed. At daybreak Saint-Saens rose, gravely bowed to the tables and chairs and went home, completely ignorant that the chairs and tables had been for hours his only audience.

The Maid of the Mist.

The story of how the famous little craft the Maid of the Mist shot the whirlpool rapids at Niagara falls is an interesting one. The boat, as has been the custom of her successors, was used to carry adventurous visitors up the Niagara river as near to the falls as was possible. On June 15, 1867, her skipper, having become financially involved, received word that the sheriff intended to seize his boat. He concluded to foil the minions of the law by shooting the rapids and prevailed upon two other reckless spirits to accompany him.

Those that witnessed the feat were thrilled at the sight. As the Maid passed under the bridge she gave a long leap downward and was almost buried from view in the foaming waters. She arose, however, with no great damage and flew into the whirlpool, a mile below, which was comparatively easy of navigation. She finally sailed down into the smooth water below Lewiston and escaped from the sheriff. The chances for successfully competing against the fury of the rapids are said to be 50 to 1, and the feat is recorded as one of marvelous and unprecedented daring.

A Silent Trio.

The fifth Duke of Devonshire and his brother, Lord George Cavendish, were noted for their taciturnity. Once, when traveling near Yorkshire, they were shown into a three bedded room. The curtains of one of the four posters were drawn. Each brother in turn looked in and went to bed in another of the three beds. Toward the close of the next day's posting one brother said to the other:

"Did you see what was in the bed last night?"

"Yes, brother," was the reply.

They had both seen a corpse.

Coffee House Wit.

In a small lot of literary curiosities recently offered for sale in London was the following printed notice, which used to be exhibited on the walls of the Drury Lane Coffee House about 1822: "It is particularly requested by the company that those who are learning to spell will ask for yesterday's paper."

YELLS AND WILD GESTICULATIONS SEASON THE BARGAINING.

The Noisy Haggling Over Prices Turns the Shopping Quarters Into a Veritable Pandemonium—Signboards and Their Many Uses.

Although the peculiar civilization of the Chinese has failed to provide the shops of the country with plate glass windows, mahogany counters, huge mirrors and the seductive shop walker, yet the tradespeople have methods of their own for engaging the attention of the public worthy of notice if not of imitation. To begin with, the competition which forces down the prices of goods in this country is unknown in China.

The manufacturers, who own most of the shops, to protect the interests of themselves and their workpeople, insist on fixing all prices and when attacked with fits of greed combine to raise the price lists, which, to prevent the shopkeeper overcharging, are posted up in the shop. All such shops belong to what we should call a union.

In free houses the price given for an article is the result of a prolonged haggle. The Chinese are such experts at bargaining that shops of good repute publicly declare that they sell only at the advertised price.

Why a Chinaman when haggling should shout at the top of his voice is not clear, but he does, consequently the vociferations of several hundred purchasers and the equally stentorian rejoinders of the tradespeople render a Chinese shopping quarter, when the public are abroad, a veritable pandemonium.

The amounts in dispute are seldom more than a half penny or so, but the parties scream and gesticulate as if their entire fortunes were at stake, the din appearing to be much louder than it really is owing to the narrowness of the streets, which are seldom more than a few feet across.

Shops which decline all abatement have a signboard inscribed, "chen pu urlo chin," which means "fixed price."

Business in China being conducted on principles mostly unknown to the outer world, it is not strange to find that shops and warehouses are never known by the family name of the proprietor. They are distinguished by some sign generally the invention of the owner, who will hold a long and anxious consultation with his family and friends in order to obtain a "hao," which shall embody some felicitous idea.

When a new shop is opened or a newcomer comes into possession, the public are made aware of what has taken place by long crimson streamers hanging from the signboards. The friendliness which exists between the shopkeeping class and their patrons results in developments of which we know nothing in this country. We should smile at the tradesman who affixed a notice in his window saying that "his wife was not very well that day" or that "his father was dead." In China, in addition to such written announcements, increased publicity is afforded by white or ash colored streamers being suspended from the signboards.

The signboards are also used to record the death of an emperor. This is done by putting the board with its letters in gaudy red and gold into mourning. The paper with which the sides of the board are covered is not black, as it would be with us, but green, and in order that business shall not be interfered with the green paper is dotted all over with the house's name. But the loyalty and grief of the shopkeeper are testified to by two streamers, on which is inscribed, "kus kshio," "the kingdom mourns."

On the occasion of a new ruler, the mourning streamers are changed for red ones, a color in China symbolical of joy. The display of bunting outside Chinese shops always strikes the European as strange, but it serves its purpose.

We shall have our work cut out when the time comes to destroy the popularity of the candle in China. This is how the candle dealers, a highly imaginative body it would seem, invest their dips with poetry. After detailing the varieties they deal in, the announcement proceeds: "At eventide the mandate came from courts of Hau. On hearing that mighty name, the scholars hurried to the tower and studied there by candlelight."

Dyers in China may be expert, but they are not modest. "We deal in kingfisher, and dark blues, also double blacks. We rival in our workmanship Celestial manufacturers."

Another dyer, after declaring that the public should only deal at the right sign, allows them to infer that he is alluding to his own, by stating that his is the "double headed (chuang feng) phenix." Although there are over 1,000,000 shops in China, it is safe to say no two signs are alike.

As the Chinese are a strange mixture of good sense and superstition, strange scenes are to be witnessed in the shops. The materials of which a prescription is composed having been made use of, the refuse is carefully deposited in the middle of the street by the shopkeeper, and his customer, in the belief that if the mess is sniffed at by the horse on which the spirit of the "T'ien-i star" rides, the result will be certain to be favorable to the patient. The "T'ien-i-star," or "Celestial cure," is invariably believed to prowl the streets nightly in order to watch over those who have been ailing and sick.—Pearson's Weekly.

A Submarine Mountain.

Almost at the very center of the Atlantic ocean, only a trifle north of the equator and about half way between South America and Africa, is a submarine mountain so high that in spite of the immense depth of the sea it thrusts its peak 70 feet above the waves. This peak, starting from its position, forms a labyrinth of islets, the whole not over half a mile in circumference, known as St. Paul's rocks. So steep is the mountain of which this lonely resting place of sea birds is the summit that one mile from these rocks a 500 fathom line with which soundings were attempted by Ross on his voyage to the Antarctic failed to touch the bottom.

A Snow Spanned Gulf.

One of the remarkable scenic features of the celebrated White mountains of New Hampshire is Tuckerman's ravine, a great gulf in the southerly side of Mount Washington, which is every year spanned by a beautiful snow arch, or cave of snow, which remains until the latter part of August. The name was conferred upon it in honor of the discoverer, Edward Tuckerman, an enthusiastic explorer of these famous hills.

A PAINTER'S VISION.

The Story of One of Munkaczy's Famous Paintings.

Many an incident in the career of Michael Schroeder—created Baron Munkaczy in the Hungarian nobility—was a pitiless illustration of the truth of Dryden's line that great wits are sure to madness near allied and thin partitions mark the bounds of separation.

His marvelous and fantastical career both as man and as artist was marked by a hundred episodes that might have been construed as evidence of an unbalanced mind, but it was not until his reason became hopelessly clouded that the world realized in how tremulous a balance had hung the intellect which had given it three pictures which won for their painter fame, riches, decorations, titles and a devoted regard such as is bestowed upon very few men in any walk of life.

His weird methods of conceiving and working out his pictures never had a more startling illustration than in the case of his most famous canvas, "Christ Before Pilate." This picture, which is 20 feet long and 12 feet high, contains more than 40 figures. All the figures save one were sketched in with a rapidity almost maniacal between dawn and twilight of one day. The one space remaining empty was that reserved for the figure of Jesus, and it remained so many days while Munkaczy worked on the other figures. As he approached the oasis of white canvas left untouched by his blazing colors the artistic and devotional fervor grew upon him, and he shut himself away from the sight of man that he might in perfect solitude and silence realize his conception of the Man of Sorrows.

When the picture was finished and had brought him worldwide fame, he always insisted that while he was sitting alone and lost in a profound reverie a white vision floated before his eyes and passed into the unpainted space on the canvas. The painter, shaking with excitement, sprang forward and with trembling hands painted in the figure which had come to him like the phantasmagoria of a dream.

However the inspiration for that dead white figure, set amid resplendent crimsons and purples, came to him, we all know what its effect upon the world was. It is estimated that 2,000,000 people saw it in the course of its triumphant tour among nations. Courts, embassies, clergy, pagans, Jews, Mohammedans, Christians, the very humble and the very great, crowded to see it. Some were moved to tears; others sank upon their knees and prayed.—Chicago Journal.

No Caucus Necessary.

A prominent Kansas politician who has been happily married for over a year sent the following unique proposal to the object of his adoration:

"My Dear Miss ——: I hereby announce myself as a candidate for your hand, and I shall use all fair and honorable means to secure the nomination. I know there are many candidates in the field, and I hesitated long before entering the race, but now I'm in it to stay. My views on love and matrimony have often been expressed in your hearing in an emphatic way. If you decide to confer upon me the honor I speak of, please fix a date for a caucus with your mother. I have no objection to her acting as temporary chairman provided it is clearly understood that I am to be chairman of the permanent organization. Should the result of the caucus prove satisfactory we can hold the primaries and select the date and place of convention. I never believed in campaigns, so if you decide to honor me I will ask you to make the convention date as early as possible. Devotedly yours, ——."

The following telegram was sent in answer by the young lady:

"Caucus unnecessary; nomination unanimous; come at once and fix the date of ratification."—Exchange.

A Peculiarity of Ants.

All ants that are not from the same nest seem to be deadly enemies, for, while an ant will do what he can to put to death a stranger, he does not seem to take a corresponding delight in aiding his friends, as is shown by the following experiment:

A scientist, in order to test the affection of ants belonging to the same nest, took six of them and imprisoned them in a small bottle, covering it with a piece of coarse mesh muslin. Their fellows paid no particular attention to the prisoners, but when the experiment was repeated, substituting, however, six ants of a rival tribe, their enemies swarmed around the bottle and after something like a week through persistent effort they succeeded in eating their way through the muslin. Two ants were found dead, evidently proving that they had been put to death, while the others probably escaped.

The Onion He Wanted.

A member of congress received a letter from a constituent one day which seemed much like others he had received. Accordingly he rushed over to the folding room and ask for Smith's onion report.

"No such report here, sir," the clerk responded. "The only onion report I know of is the one issued by the department of agriculture."

"Well, you must be mistaken," replied the member. "This applicant is not a farmer, he's a clergyman. Here, look at the letter!"

"Oh," said the clerk after a moment's perusal of the letter "he doesn't want Smith's onion report; he wants a Smithsonian report. I'll take a cigar."—Kansas City Independent.

The Value of Names.

Hicks—Wonder how Mortar is getting on nowadays?

Wicks—Getting along finely. It was only two years ago he started out as an apothecary. He is already a druggist, and if his luck holds out he will be a pharmacist before the end of another twelvemonth.

Hicks—But what difference will that make?

Wicks—A big difference. An apothecary oftentimes has to sell things at only 50 cents above cost, and a druggist never takes less than 100 per cent, but to a pharmacist there is no limit.—Boston Transcript.

In a Critical Condition.

"I hear your husband is very sick, Aunt Dinah."

"Yes'm."

"Nothing serious, I hope. His condition is not critical?"

"Critical! I should say he wuz! He ain't satisfied with nuffin."—Christian Register.

WAYS OF THE FAKIR.

HE FREQUENTLY GETS HIS STOCK IN TRADE ON TRUST.

One Day His Pockets Bulge With Coin, and on Another He Is a Mendicant—He Is a Good Judge of Toys' Selling Qualities.

The street fakir is a highly interesting character. His fortunes are variable as the wind and his place of business as changeable. One day finds him in a Bowery eating house, his pockets bulging with dimes and nickles; the next, in line with a gang of the city's nondescript awaiting his turn at the entrance of a free soup house. He wanders from city to city, wherever the blind goddess or a great gathering of humanity may chance to lead, and wherever he goes his voice is uppermost in the din, and his little, fragile three legged stand or cheap valise is the center of a curious crowd. He is a traveler without funds, a merchant without stock and a business man without capital.

"How in the world does he get along? Where does he obtain a new stock of goods when luck goes against him?" asked the reporter of a young inventor who has had many dealings with the "profession."

"Well, it's pretty hard to say," was the reply. "I have known hundreds of them and each seems to have a dozen different dodges for taking in new stock when he finds himself without money. Probably, however, I could best answer your question by relating my first experience with the fakir." Then the young man, who makes a very comfortable living by inventing gewgaws for the childish public to buy one day and throw away the next, leaned back in his easy chair and smiled.

"Two years ago," he said, "I contrived a simple toy for children which I thought would 'go,' as the saying is, and placed a want 'ad' in one of the papers for men to sell it. On reaching my office the morning upon which the advertisement appeared I found the corridor crowded with the most heterogeneous mass of humanity imaginable. Some were fairly well dressed, others were literally in rags. Yet there was not a single man among them but had the sharpened features and shrewd, catlike eyes of him who wins a living by matching his wits against the rest of the world.

"I walked briskly into my office, anticipating a shower of money from so large a crowd. I glanced nervously at the 1,000 neatly arranged boxes, each containing one of my toys, and feared that there would not be enough to fill the orders of my customers. After preparing things about the office I opened the door and motioned to half a dozen of the fellows in the hallway. They entered the office and glanced at me expectantly.

"'Got somethin good?' asked one, who constituted himself spokesman.

"I opened one of the boxes and exhibited my toy. It was a simple device, made to sell for 10 cents, the fakirs, of course, buying it for one-half of the retail price. They seemed to like it.

"'I say, cap,' exclaimed the fellow who had spoken before, 'how many of 'em can you let me have on this garment?' And he carefully exhibited the best preserved section of a very dilapidated overcoat.

"'I don't understand you,' I answered.

"'Well, to tell the truth,' explained the fakir, 'I spent every copper I had last night, an I want to leave this coat as security for as many of the toys as you'll let me have until I git on my feet again.'

"I gave him five of the little boxes and tossed his overcoat in a corner. The next fakir to present himself was a young boy, who had a single 5 cent piece. He bought one of my toys and departed. In ten minutes he returned to buy two more with the money he had received from the first sale. That boy was an example of the man who piles up a fortune. In three weeks he sold 800 of the toys.

"After I had disposed of the boy an older man appeared and secured a fair stock in trade on my good nature and a portable three legged stand, such as many fakirs use in exposing their wares for sale upon the street. The next man pledged an overcoat similar in appearance to the first one I had accepted in lieu of money and on receiving his quota of toys rushed from the room in great haste. Surely, I thought, that fellow is ambitious and anxious to get to work upon the street. I like him. When I turned to place the overcoat he had given me with the other garment I had taken, his haste in leaving the office was explained. There was no other overcoat. While I was negotiating with the man who left the three legged stand, the other rascal had slipped behind my back, secured the coat and pledged it to me for the second time. After this experience I saw each fakir alone and watched him carefully.

"Gradually my office began to fill up with all sorts of pledges, until it resembled a miniature junk shop, but in a few hours the men began to return and reclaim their temporary sureties with the cash they had realized on the toys. Only one man, the fellow who had used the overcoat for a pledge the second time, failed to return."

The novelties that are sold on the street in New York do not appear in other cities until seven or eight months later. Whenever a man invents something new, he puts it on sale in the metropolis because the fakirs here are the best in the world, and the judgment of New Yorkers is considered an excellent criterion of the future success or failure of an article. The greatest obstacle that confronts an inventor in preparing a toy or puzzle to be sold upon the streets is the necessary cheapness of the article. As the fakirs say, "Anything that passes the 10 cent limit don't go." A man will readily spend 5 cents or a dime to satisfy his curiosity, but more than that he will not give. The fakir may have some knickknack for 15 cents really worth that amount, and he might talk of its merit in his peculiar vernacular until his throat dried up, but the crowd would pass him by, for in the majority of cases a 15 cent purchase means changing a quarter.

On a 10 cent article the fakir makes about half, and the inventor clears 2 or 3 cents, hence it is apparent that where an article becomes universally popular there is a fortune in store for its originator, as the sales often reach into the millions.—New York Mail and Express.

Thomas A. Edison, that real genius of electricity, has invented a real storage battery. Without going into technicalities, it may be briefly stated that you can tap electricity from a storage battery and the current can be used in any one of innumerable ways, to do any of the innumerable things done by the current at a stationery plant. A real, practical storage battery has been the dream, the desire, the goal of electricians for many decades. Storage batteries, not steam engines, will propel the steamers, whose voyages will be faster and can be longer, because there will be more room for provisions. A fleet can be kept at sea as long as its provisions last. There will be no more trolly lines, nor trolly cars; locomotives will move almost silently; steam and gasoline automobiles will be of the past. Residences and offices will no longer be lighted by gas but in each building there will be a private power plant sufficient to give all the light and heat necessary.

The University of California is to be made the headquarters for the irrigation investigations of the Unitrd States government. Elwood Mead, United States irrigation expert in charge, the leading irrigation specialist of America, has been invited to organize a department of irrigation in the University. He will reman at the head of the national irrigation bureau, but his home and office will be in Berkeley, and he will spend a portion of each term lecturing at the University. His first course, to begin about March 1st and run through April, will be on "Institutions of Irrigation." The very extensive field investigations which the government is pursuing under his direction will offer to his students the best possible opportunity for practical study. The students can aid directly in the government investigations of methods of irrigation, the duty of water, the building of storage reservoirs, the conservation of flood waters, etc.

A bill has been introduced by Assemblyman Miller which provides that any person who is beaten in a gambling game may sue the winner and recover three times the amount lost. The bill is in the form of an amendment to a section of the Penal Code and providing that whoever by playing or betting at any of said games loses to any person so playing or betting any sum of money or any goods whatever and pays and delivers the same or any part thereof to the winner, may sue for and recover treble the value of said money or goods as in a civil action, and if the loser does not within three months after such loss commence suit for said recovery, any other person may sue for and recover treble the value thereof. This will open up some new games. If you play scientifically enough to lose you are a 300 per cent winner by law.

Senator W. A. Clark of Montana has declared positively that the recent Harriman syndicate deal would in no way interfere with the construction of his proposed San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad. He claims that engineers are already in the field surveying a route between Los Angeles and Redlands, and this force of men will continue its work the entire way to Salt Lake. He positively denies that he has made any overtures to sell out to the Harriman syndicate. "I am in possession of two surveys that have already been made from Salt Lake to Nevada, but I am not content with these and will at the conclusion of the engineers' work select from the three the route which I consider the best. I will build direct to Salt Lake City."

The loss of the Rio Janero at the gateway of San Francosco is appalling and a sharp reminder that science is making but little headway in protecting human life at sea. Hidden rocks below and impenetrable vapor above the surface are still the greatest dangers that beset navigation.

Any mineral lands in any forest reservation which may have been of may be shown to be such, and subject to entry under the existing mining laws of the United States, are subject to such location and entry in the usual manner.

The sum of $300,000,000 pure gold, if in the shape of a ball, would in such globular form represent a sphere a little over 12½ feet in diameter, giving gold a value of $20.671834625 per ounce.

"Bloody Kansas" is nothing if not bleeding. In riots it is mostly the innocent who get killed. In other States there would be found some way of enforcing the law without the use of hatchets.

On Sunday the bereaved husband and friends brought the remains to her old home and they were laid away at the cemetery after touching services at the school house.

According to telegram, P. H. Mack, Esq., will return Tuesday next.

Washington's Birthday dance, given at Mairs' hall last Friday night, was well attended and thoroughly enjoyed by the young folks.

Dr. Vance & Co., from San Francisco will be at the Independence Hotel on Wednesday next. Consultation free.

Through an Olancha correspondent the Californian of Bakersfield publishes a serious account of the "finding" out here of that rotten old fake, the petrified man.

Our Big Pine correspondent says: Bakersdeld men have been quietly surveying and locating phosphate formation on the Inyo's east of here. They have located to date in the neighborhood of 10,000 acres. We will wait till the outsiders strke oil on the lands and perhaps we can work for them.

Great numbers of Eastern people are now taking advantage of the low rates of railroad fare to the Coast and are coming into the State by the train load each week. With the great water supply of this year, we believe that a thousand or more of them would do well by heading to Owens Valley, provided they were all able to buy or locate lands at once.

Rupture, Piles, Kidney, Liver and Stomach troubles successfully treated by Dr. Vance from S. F. Consultation free. Return monthly.

J. Sub Johnson has erected a building at the corner of School and Spring streets and has fitted it up for an assay office. He is as well prepared for qualitative or quantitative analysis of ores as any establishment need be. He has received ores from Randsburg and Independence for assay, as well as ores procured in Fresno and Tulare counties.—Visalia Times.

Church Social at Lone Pine.

LONE PINE, Feb. 25.

One of the most pleasant events which has taken place in this vicinity this season was the social given in the Town Hall by the members and friends of the the M. E. Church on the evening of the 19th. The object of the gathering was to manifest to Rev. Mr. Bigelow, the pastor of the Church, the esteem in which he is held by the community and to give assistance to the worthy cause for which he labors.

About 8 o'clock the meeting was called to order and Rev. J. B. Miller elected chairman, after which a very interesting and helpful program, consisting of music, recitations and addresses, was carried out. Following this was the serving of an elegant luncheon by the ladies, and every one present was ready to say that the ladies of Lone Pine can't be beaten in this respect. Rev. Bigelow and wife were presented with good things for the kitchen and coin to the amount of $25, and all went home feeling that a pleasant and profitable evening had been spent.

Rev. Mr. Bigelow is a good man and splendid preacher, and well deserves this confidence and esteem of the preacher.

Oil "Indications."

One of the oil men at Olancha writes to the Bakersfield Californian as follows:

"Each day comes newer and more flattering evidence that these formations exist in the state. Gypsum, and crystalized gypsum, the whitest of which is nearly as light as a feather, and very nearly approaches alabaster, with brown, gray and dark slate to perfectly white shale, is very profuse; and where I am now working the sand rock ledges are exposed to a depth varying from 15 to 30 feet, in all the various shades of color—white, gray, yellow, green and red—and from the finest of rotten stone to the size of marbles. If I have not found 'saturated' sand rock, then my olfactory apparatus is not in working order. This will be more fully demonstrated, however, when I have access to a blow pipe.

"This survey comprises eleven thousand acres, and has been made and all the corners established, and locations made and recorded in strict compliance with the law, It has been very gratifying to find the government stakes (white oak) with all the marks perfectly legible, which has confirmed the work from day to day."

Shakespeare Evening.

On the evening of Friday, the 8th of March, the Dramatic Club of Independence will give an evening of Shakespearian readings. The Club has been busy all winter studying the great dramatist, and the proposed entertainment is by way of closing this series of studies before undertaking the popular drama which will be brought out shortly.

The Dramatic Club is not a money-making institution, but is intended for the instruction and entertainment of its members and friends. The selections to be presented have been carefully studied and will be costumed with as much accuracy as the occasion permits. All are cordially invited.

The cast for the evening is as follows:

I. Quarrel scene from Julius Caesar.
Cassius ..... S. W. Austin
Brutus ..... J. E. Eibeshutz

II. Murder scene from Macbeth.
Macbeth ..... Wm. D. Dehy
Lady Macbeth ..... Mrs. Austin

III. Court scene from Merchant of Venice.

Shylock ..... S. W. Austin
Antonio ..... Wm. D. Dehy
Bassanio ..... Fred. Stewart
Gratianio ..... J. E. Eibeshutz

J. D. Harger, plaintiff, vs. J. W. Denny and Edwin Merryman, defendants—Action to quiet title to land near Bishop. Judgment entered for plaintiff.

Several of our exchanges state that R. J. Laws, of the C. & C. road, is surveyeying the line for a third rail between Mound House and Wabuska. As Mr. Laws passed through here last week measuring track there may possibly be some foundation for this report. Certain it is that a broad-gauge road into Mason Valley from the Mound House would be a great convenience and benefit to cattle shippers and those who are opening up mining industries in this section of the country, and we are inclined to believe the increase of business that would come to the road would soon pay for the expense of the change, The Mason Valley country is calling for considerable freight now and the transfer of it at the Mound House makes the transportation charges high and delays all goods en route one day or more.—Lyon County Times.

PRESBYTERIAN PASTOR PRAISES PE-RU-NA.

First Presbyterian Church of Greensboro, Ga., and Its Pastor and Elder.

The day was when men of prominence hesitated to give their testimonials to proprietary medicines for publication. This remains true today of most proprietary medicines. But Peruna has become so justly famous, its merits are known to so many people of high and low stations, that no one hesitates to see his name in print recommending Peruna.

The highest men in our nation have given Peruna a strong endorsement. Men representing all classes and stations are equally represented.

A dignified representative of the Presbyterian church in the person of Rev. E. G. Smith does not hesitate to state publicly that he has used Peruna in his family and found it cured when other remedies failed. In this statement the Rev. Smith is supported by an elder in his church.

Rev. E. G. Smith, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Greensboro, Ga., writes:

"Having used Peruna in my family for some time it gives me pleasure to testify to its true worth. My little boy, seven years of age, had been suffering for some time with catarrh of the lower bowels. Other remedies had failed, but after taking two bottles of Peruna the trouble almost entirely disappeared. For this special malady I consider it well nigh a specific. As a tonic for weak and worn-out people it has few or no equals."—Rev. E. G. Smith.

Mr. M. J. Rossman, a prominent merchant of Greensboro, Ga., and an elder in the Presbyterian church of that place, has used Peruna, and in a recent letter to the Peruna Medicine Co., of Columbus, Ohio, writes as follows:

"For a long time I was troubled with catarrh of the kidneys and tried many remedies, all of which gave me no relief. Peruna was recommended to me by several friends, and after using a few bottles, I am pleased to say that the long-looked-for relief was found and I am now enjoying better health than I have for years, and can heartily recommend Peruna to all similarly afflicted. It is certainly a grand medicine."—M. J. Rossman.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Address Dr. Hartman, President of the Hartman Sanitarium, Columbus, Ohio.

Another Romance Spoiled.

"Tell a good story and stick to it," is an old maxim that is illustrated in a story that is going the rounds along the Rialto. A certain well known actor floated into his home one morning about 2 o'clock. The wife of his bosom was waiting up for him. He told her he had been out all the evening with one of their friends, Charlie B., and then related an interesting fairy story of how Charlie had taken a crowd to supper, how funny Charlie had been all the evening, how well Charlie looked in his new suit, how he said this, that and the other. After telling a 15 minute story, to which the gentle partner of his joys and out of work periods listened with respectful attention, but cynical mien, he paused for breath. Then she, in a confident now I've got you tone, said:

"That's a lovely romance you've been giving me, and I hate to spoil it, but Charlie has been here nearly all the evening waiting to see you about an engagement. He left only about half an hour ago."

The teller of the tale looked rather dazed for a moment as if he had been struck. Then quickly gathering himself together he assumed a bold front, with hands in his pockets, head thrown back and, in defiant innocence and emphasizing each word, said:

"Well, that's my story, and I'm not going to change it for anybody."—Clipper.

A Fetching Compliment.

She was not from Chicago.

"Do not anger me," she said.

"How am I to know when you are angry?" he asked.

"I always stamp my feet," she answered.

He looked down at her dainty shoes.

"Impossible," he said. "There isn't room for a stamp on either of them."

That fetched her.—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Pat's Retort.

An Irishman passing a store in London saw nothing inside but a man at a table. The thing struck him as being very odd, so he went in and inquired what was sold there. "Asses' heads," said the man at the table. "They must be in great demand," said Pat, "for I see you have only your own left."

The Story of a Mean Man.

This is the story of a mean man. He may not be the meanest on record, but he carries a very fair brand of close fistedness. He had a contract to supply a certain amount of crushed stone. The machine he used could turn out all the work he could get by running eight hours a day.

The mean man had an engineer who was a genius. The genius went to his employer one day and said he thought he could make some improvements in that machine so it would do more work in less time. The genius was paid by the month.

He worked on the machine for several days, taking it apart and putting it together again. When reconstructed, it proved to have greater efficiency than before, so much so that it did the same amount of work in one minute and a half that it used to take four and a half to do.

The mean man, however, could get no more contracts than before. He could fill all his orders by running about three hours a day. The mean man then went to the genius and said:

"See here, Henry, I've been paying you by the month, but there isn't as much work as there used to be—not enough to keep you busy. I shall have to pay you by the hour after this."

Henry demurred. He had been too faithful, but he didn't think that ought to reduce his earnings over one-half. His employer was firm, however, and Henry resigned.—New York Mail and Express.

When the Chief Cook Leaves.

The importance of a chief cook becomes evident when the time for his departure arrives. One day last week the proprietor of a popular restaurant on Fifth avenue decided for reasons of his own to part with the services of the man who had for some years looked after his kitchen. The chef retired and with him more than 20 of his assistants. This number included his assistant cooks and every man in the kitchen, even to the unimportant functionary who presides over the refrigerators. This exodus did not surprise the proprietor.

The chef had brought the others with him, and they were in a way more closely attached to his service than to the proprietor who paid them their wages. When a substitute was hired, he also brought the same complete corps of assistants who are supposed to know the methods of their chief better than any assistants not directly employed by him.

This manner of employment exists in all the large restaurants, where the head cook is absolute master in the kitchen and controls all the branches of his department down to the most unimportant. He is held responsible on this ground for all that may happen under his direction even if he was not personally concerned in the matter.—New York Sun.

DEAFNESS CANNOT BE CURED

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by catarrh) that can not be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

There Was a Mistake.

"I think," he began as he halted a pedestrian, "I think I made a mistake with the cabman who drove me to the Corcoran Art gallery. I am quite sure I gave him a $10 bill, but he must have mistaken it for a $2 bill."

"And you hope to find him again?" asked the man of the stranger to the city.

"Why, yes, I have hopes."

"Well, you are about as green as they make 'em. That cabman deliberately swindled you out of many dollars."

"I can hardly believe it. He looked so honest and truthful that I—I"—

"That you ought to have asked him to hold your watch and the rest of your money! My dear old Josh from the cornfields, let me say"—

At that minute a cab rattled up, and the driver dismounted and said:

"See here, old man, there is a mistake. You probably meant to give me a $2 bill, and I thought it was one when I gave you $1 in change."

"But I think it was a ten, my friend."

"No; it was a twenty, and I have been driving about for half an hour to find you and restore the money. Here it is."

"And what was it you were going to say to your dear old Josh from the cornfields?" asked the old man as he turned to the wise person.

But the wise person was there no longer. He was flying for a car as if running for his life.—Washington Post.

USEFUL SNOW.

But For It Much of the Earth Would Be Little Better Than a Desert.

If all the condensed moisture of the atmosphere were to fall as rain and none of it as snow, hundreds of thousands of square miles of the earth's surface now yielding bountiful crops would be little better than a desert. The tremendous economic gain for the world at large which results from the difference between snow and rain is seldom realized by the inhabitants of fertile and well watered lowlands.

It is in the extensive regions where irrigation is a prime necessity in agriculture that the special uses of the snow come chiefly into view. All through the winter the snow is falling upon the high mountains and packing itself firmly into the ravines. Thus in nature's great icehouse a supply of moisture is stored up for the following summer.

All through the warm months the hardened snowbanks are melting gradually. In trickling streams they steadily feed the rivers, which as they flow through the valleys are utilized for irrigation. If this moisture fell as rain, it would almost immediately wash down through the rivers, which would hardly be fed at all in the summer, when the crops most needed water.

These facts are so well known as to be commonplace in the Salt Lake valley and in the subarid regions of the west generally. They are not so well understood in New Jersey or Ohio, where snow is sometimes a picturesque, sometimes a disagreeable, feature of winter.

In all parts of the country the notion prevails that the snow is of great value as a fertilizer. Scientists, however, are inclined to attach less importance to its service in soil nutrition—for some regions which have no snow are exceedingly fertile—than to its worth as a blanket during the months of high winds. It prevents the blowing off of the finely pulverized richness of the top soil. This, although little perceived, would often be a very great loss.

In nature's every form there is meaning.—Youth's Companion.

An Experiment In Journalism.

Once there was a really radical paper, in London it was, but the man who made it now lives here and tells the tale. It was one of those papers which are a tragedy. They represent the wreck of the enthusiasm of strong men who must find the outlet for their apostolate. This paper began by being at odds with all that was established, and it had readers. But as time went on the man who made the paper drove off singly and in groups all those who had begun by being his supporters. It was found a little too radical for them, and they no longer kept step with its newest march.

"Of course I now can see that such a paper was foredoomed to failure," the editor said after he had recited the early history of his venture. "I confess it was pretty strong even for British radicals. After the circulation had dwindled down to the extremists I succeeded in alienating about half of them by denouncing social democracy as feudal oppression, and the other half left me when I attacked atheism on the score of its superstitious tendencies. After that I ran the paper as long as I could without any subscribers. But I had to give it up. Nobody would read it except myself, and toward the end I had to give up reading it myself. I found it too unsettling. So it stopped."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

The Longest Word.

"Rob," said Tom, "which is the most dangerous word to pronounce in the English language?"

"Don't know, unless it's a swearing word."

"Pooh!" said Tom. "It's 'stumbled,' because you are sure to get a tumble between the first and last letter."

"Ha, ha!" said Rob. "Now, I've got one for you. I found it one day in the paper. Which is the longest word in the English language?"

"Incomprehensibility," said Tom promptly.

"No, sir; it's 'smiles,' because there's a whole mile between the first and last letter."

"Ho, ho!" cried Tom, "that's nothing. I know a word that has over three miles between its beginning and ending."

"What's that?" asked Rob faintly.

"Beleaguered," said Tom.—Pearson's.

His Accent and His Country.

On one occasion during a visit to America Michael Gunn, who assisted Gilbert and Sullivan in bringing out many of their operas, was trying the voices of some candidates for the chorus. One of them sang in a sort of affected Italian broken English. The stage manager interrupted. "Look here," he said, "that accent won't do for sailors or pirates. Give us a little less Mediterranean and a little more Whitechapel."

Here Gunn turned and said: "Of what nationality are you? You don't sound Italian."

Survived the Battles

But Succumbed to the Hardships and Strain of Army Life.—A Story of Peculiar Interest.

From the News, Bourbon, Ind.

Among the multitude of heroic men in the civil war, few survivors of those perilous adventures, extraordinary labors, privations and trials incident to army life, have not felt the ill effects of those days of service.

Mr. Charles W. Tippett, of Tippecanoe, Ind., an old soldier of the 73d Indiana Regiment, in speaking of his experience, says: "For several months, about one year and a half ago, I noticed after getting up in the morning an annoying stiffness in my left arm and leg. After I had walked around some, this did not bother me. But last May I attempted to get out of bed one morning and found something was unusually wrong with me. It was after considerable effort that I succeeded in getting out of bed, but I fell to the floor as soon as I attempted to stand. I managed to get up and walk across the room, but fell again, this time unconscious.

"My folks were away from home at the time and as soon as I recovered sufficiently I went and consulted a physician. He told me that I had had a stroke of paralysis.

"The only medicine he gave me was a bottle of liniment to rub on the parts affected. I received no benefit whatever from this, and I became discouraged. The doctor told me there was nothing that would help me and that I would soon have another stroke and probably die from the effect.

"Soon after this I read of a Mr. Shepard, a grain dealer at Indianapolis, who had a stroke of paralysis, completely losing control of himself from his hips down, and how he received great benefit from five or six boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I decided to try these pills and after taking the first box I felt greatly benefited.

"I have taken about ten or twelve boxes since then and I have been improving steadily and now have almost perfect use of my arm and leg. When I began taking these pills I had almost lost the use of my entire left side; one corner of my mouth was drawn down and my left arm had become almost two inches smaller than its former size, but these deformities have now entirely disappeared.

"I also had been troubled with palpitation of the heart but I am now entirely cured of that ailment. I know of many others who have received great benefit from these pills. My general health is beter today than it has been for years, and I ascribe this all to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and it is with a feeling of pleasure that I can recommend their great merit to the public."

THE UNSPEAKABLE TURK.

He Scorns All Effort but Military Service and Agriculture.

A Turk thinks it the most natural thing in the world to lose a province and, having lost it, to quit and live elsewhere. He talks quite complacently of leaving Constantinople some day. He will go over to Asia and found another capital. He originates nothing. He takes what he finds without assimilating it and remains profoundly Turkish. He leaves no trace of his occupation except ruins. Practically there is nothing at Belgrade, Sofia and Athens to show that for centuries they were Turkish cities.

All occupations, except agricultural and military service, are distasteful to him. Yet there are two other characteristics even more important than these. The first is his sense of discipline. It is this which keeps together the apparently tottering fabric of the Turkish empire. It makes the half fed, half clothed soldier ready to endure every privation and prevents the corruption and incapacity of the officers from producing the anarchy which would be inevitable in any other country. Sedition is unknown. Even complaints are rare, and were a holy war proclaimed there is not a man who would not be prepared to die in defense of the system of extortion which grinds him down.

His second characteristic is his laziness, in spite of the laborious industry of the Turkish peasant. The fact is that the Turk is too proud to do many things, too stupid to do others. His religion inculcates a fatalism which tends to a conviction that effort is useless.—London Telegraph.

DAN CUPID'S PENANCE,

Dan Cupid once, in penitential mood
As Lent drew near, impelled by Conscience's pricks,
Resolved to try his turn at being good,
And issued cards—"At home from 4 till 6."

His guests came flocking at his royal call,
And dimpled cupids, dressed in smiles and wings,
Served tea ambrosial nectar to them all
With heart-shaped sandwiches and more good things.

When all were served Dan Cupid took the floor,
"My friends, before you leave me to go home
Some trite advice I'm going to give once more,
And each a gift, for use in time to come.

"There's many a one of you—I'll give no name—
Who owes to me a husband or a wife;
Some, being happy, bless me; some—for all are not the same—
Blame me for their unhappy married life.

"My conscience vexed me sore for those whom Fate,
Perhaps through me has treated most unkind;
But here's a remedy, e'en though it seems too late,
A sovereign cure and panacea you'll find.

"You know love should be blind," he archly said, and passed
A 'kerchief, neatly folded, to each guest;
"When matrimonial seas are rough, with teary clouds o'ercast,
Bind this on both fault-finding eyes; then, being sightless—
Let love do the rest."
—Puck.

THE GUILTY MAN

SHE had nerved herself to meet her father. She glanced in the mirror and saw how pale she was. Her father would be pale, too, but how different his pallor from her own—his a pallor like none other in the world.

A shiver passed over her. Did she love her father? Her anger went out to him, not her love; her love was for Jack, and he could never be anything to her. Last night she had written to Jack and told him the truth, and the truth would separate them forever. She was the daughter of a thief!

What uselessness it had been for her mother to move hundreds of miles from the old home; it had been done for the husband, not for the daughter. For the daughter there had been a half year's residence in this new place, and a learning to love a man whom she had last night declined to marry. Her father had wrought this unhappiness as he had wrought so much more.

What grief had not her father wrought! The day he went to prison for the defalcation in the bank where he had been cashier and her mother's father manager, had not her mother's father fallen dead? The world had said the old banker could not stand the disgrace. And what more? Had not her mother's mother, always an invalid, been stricken by her husband's death, and never been told of her son-in-law's crime? There had been a mass of deception, the poor, feeble woman being led to believe that her daughter's husband, whom she loved as a son, had gone away on business, and letters written in his prison cell had been read to her, and they told her of great prosperity in the West, with a cheerfulness that was appalling. Yes, the girl almost hated her father as she thought over the events of the past four years. And yet, would she have hated him save for Jack?

She pressed her hands fiercely to her eyes.

Suddenly she started; there was a step on the stairs, her mother was bringing her father up to her. How should she meet him? Had it not been for Jack she knew how she should have met him! But her father had forced Jack from her.

The steps ascending the stairs stopped. There was a cough outside the library door. She knew the sharp little cough—she used to fly to meet her father, four years back, when she heard that little cough in the hall in the dear old home. Now she did not move from the chair she sat in.

She heard a voice outside the door, her mother urging her father to enter the room. Then the handle of the door turned, and her mother led in a strangely aged man.

The girl rose; her father stood before her, expectancy in his face. She went slowly to him, and held her forehead up to his lips. Her mother looked angrily at her, but she went back to her seat and caught up some sewing.

"Annie," said the mother, sharply, "is this the way to meet your father? Do you know that all that has occurred has been more to me than to any one else in the world? And yet I forgive because I love. And you who have a lover——"

"I have no lover," coldly interrupted the girl. "I couldn't deceive him any longer. I wrote him last night; I told him the truth, and that I would not marry him."

The father shrank in his chair.

"Ah," said the mother, "now I understand." She turned to her husband. "Mark, do not mind it, dear. You have me, and I shall never fail you. Have I ever failed you? What is done is done; it is all wiped away; it is only remembered by your daughter, not by me; and you are as much to me after all the mistakes and sufferings as the day when I stood by your side and vowed to be a loving and true wife till God should part us in death. We always spoke of you, mother and I."

"Your mother," his dry lips said, "where is she?"

His wife caught his hand.

"Dear," she said, "can you bear a little more?"

He looked at her.

"Annie," she said, sternly, "get me those letters."

The girl went and took from the bookcase a packet, which she brought to her mother.

"My letters to your mother," the man's lips seemed to say, "and unopened."

His wife fondled his hand.

"It was only a few months ago," she said. "I could not tell you the truth, any more than I could tell her. The truth would have made you unhappier, and I wished to tell you myself. She loved you as she loved me. One morning one of your letters came, and until I could read it her she asked me to let her hold it. An hour later we found her with the letter held up to her heart, and she was very white and quiet. There had been no struggle whatever—no pain. We laid her beside father, whom she had never ceased grieving for, and who had given her every comfort in life, even when, I am sure, he could hardly afford the extravagances ordered by her physicians. It is all over, and happily over, for both of them, dear, and you were always kind and good to them."

A low, long sigh broke from the man. Then silence fell; the sound of the tram bells in the street came distinctly to them, and the ticking of the clock on the mantel was strangely loud.

There was a movement on the part of Annie; she rose and came and kneeled beside her father's chair.

"Father," she said, "you must forgive me. I am not very happy. I do not mean to be hard, but I can't go back from my reasoning. You have not only mother, but you have me also; I will do what I can, I am sure you know that, and after a while you will not miss anything in me."

"Go back to your seat," commanded her mother. "Do you know that you are in the presence of a broken heart? Doesn't your father accuse himself of more than you accuse him of? Who are you, with your paltry love troubles, to come to him in a time like this?"

"Hush, Mary!" said her husband, "hush!"

The silence fell again.

Annie sat alone; she was apart from everything; there was no love for her any more. Her father had expiated his sin in the eyes of the world; in her heart the sin that had been his still lived. For there was Jack, and she had given him up because of her father's guilt. There was a narrowing of the radius; no matter for Jack, if her father were only an innocent man! Love surely created a desire for purity, for, since she had learned to love Jack, her father's sin had grown and grown upon her, and before that the sin had been tempered by her pitying love and her prayers for heaven's forgiveness.

The daughter of a thief! Oh, why had she met Jack? Why had she allowed herself to care for him? Why had she let herself feel glad when she knew that he loved her? Why had she greatly desired that he should tell her that he had given his heart to her, and demanded her own in return?

How many sadly confused questions did she put to herself as she sat there in the miserable silence, her mother and her father at a greater distance from her than they had ever been before, while she vainly tried to accuse her heart and her daughterly affection of transgressing, even though Jack called through the silence, that, but for her father's crime, she might have claimed woman's perfect happiness on earth.

Her mother and her father apparently failed to realize how much she was going through; it was only her lack of response to their love that touched them. Her adoration of a man who might have been her husband was merely a foolishness of hers, and not to be placed in the same category with her duty as a daughter—the daughter of a thief! That miserable word, that disgraceful word would come uppermost to her. But for Jack, would this have been so? The daughter of a thief!

There came a tap on the door, and it sounded on her ear like thunder.

Her mother went to the door and opened it.

"Mark," she said to her husband, "it is cook; she wishes to speak to me about dinner. We are going to have all the things you used to—all the things you like. Of course, the servants know nothing, dear; you have been west, you know. The servants have only been with us since we moved here. Would you like to come downstairs, or will you stay here in the library?"

"I will stay here," he said, in his hushed way. "Here."

"Very well,' returned his wife. "I shan't be gone long. See here is all the old furniture, all your books, just as you used to like them, and the pictures."

She leaned over and kissed him before she went out, and closed the door behind her.

Annie was alone with her father. She heard him moving carefully around, taking up a book, only to lay it down again. He went up and looked at his wife's picture hanging between two tall bookcases, then at that of his wife's father. Before this last picture he lingered, making no sound, but looking, looking at the face of the old bank manager who had fallen dead the day his trusted cashier and his only daughter's husband had gone to serve a sentence in prison. Annie could not see him, but she knew all that her father did. Her back was toward him as she leaned over her sewing, and her heart beat fast when he turned from the picture at last and swiftly crossed the carpet.

When his hand was laid upon her arm she almost shrieked aloud.

"Annie!" said her father's voice. It was a firm voice now, no quaver of doubt in it, and it forced her like a command she dared not disobey.

She rose from her seat and faced him.

Despite the physical changes in him, she saw before her his old self—strong, not unbrave, not disloyal, not a criminal.

"You have given up your lover," he went on, rapidly. "You have given him up because of me. Pay attention to me. I will tell you what I had hoped never to tell a living soul on earth. And I must speak before your mother comes back, for she must never know. But you must know, and the man who had asked you to be his wife and whom you refused on account of me. I will go to him, and I will tell him as I tell you, that I have wrecked no life, that I have not wrecked my daughter's happiness. Do you hear me? I have not interfered with your right to be happy with the man you love. I have been adjudged a criminal; I have served a criminal's sentence. But I am an innocent man," and he turned and pointed to the picture of his wife's father, "that man knew it. I sacrificed, not your mother, not you, but my own standing in society and the minds of men for the sake of my wife's father and his invalid wife."

She gasped, she understood him, and she trembled from head to foot.

"I would never have told you," he went on, "only that you gave up your life's happiness because of my disgrace. Your forfeited love for me would never have brought this confession, for what I did was done to save an old man and an old woman who had been as a mother to me. If nature could not make your love surmount my shame, that love is of little account. Your mother's father's sin made me a prisoner; it was he who took the money, and I the blame. I have proofs of all this, and I am glad I never destroyed them, for I must show those proofs to the daughter whose lack of love makes my word of no account."

"Father!"

There was a quality in her cry that told him more than many words; she sprang to his arms, her heart held closely to his—he was innocent; he was innocent; and though her life's greater love might be over and done, the man who had asked her to marry him had not loved the daughter of a thief!

There was some one in the room, though neither of them heeded till the girl's name was spoken by the newcomer.

"Jack!" she cried out, and clung the closer to her father; "Jack!"

"You did not hear me knock," said he. "I came to tell you that I refuse to obey your note; you love me as I love you, and you will be my wife. And coming in here, I have heard what your father said to you. Your father—will he not let me call him mine?"

Her father's head was raised, and he looked deeply into the young man's eyes.

"Well, well," said the hustling voice of the wife, coming into the library. "And Jack here! Mark, my dear—Annie—Mark, is this the happy end of all your sadness and pain?"

"Yes," said the "guilty man," as he placed the hand of his daughter into that of her lover. "Yes."—Spare Moments.

Americans Saw its Uses.

"Excelsior, an American invention which is extensively used for packing purposes and in the manufacture of bedding and various other upholstery uses, is not, as is generally believed, made from shavings," said a wholesale dealer in the material to the writer recently. "It is an article of regular manufacture and between 35,000 and 40,000 tons of the curling, wood fiber are turned out by the Eastern and Western lumber mills annually.

"Basswood and poplar are the woods used in the production. The logs are sawed into lengths of eighteen inches, which is the length of a fiber of excelsior. These blocks are split in halves and the wood is properly seasoned. Excelsior is made of different degrees of coarseness and fineness of fiber. In the manufacture a series of knife points run down in parallel lines that are spaced according to the width of the fiber to be made. A following knife slices off the whole face of the block thus served. The fibers curl and commingle as the knife sets them free. An excelsior machine makes 200 to 300 strokes a minute, every stroke cutting off a tier of fiber across the face of the block. The usual commercial package of excelsior is a bale weighing about fifty pounds. At wholesale excelsior sells at from $16 to $40 a ton.

"American excelsior is exported to Central America, to the West Indies, to England and other foreign countries, where several thousand tons of the fiber are shipped yearly."—Washington Star.

Empress Tree of Rapid Growth.

Probably the largest specimen empress tree—paulownia imperialis—in America is in Independence square, Philadelphia. It is one of the first lot introduced into America about fifty years ago, and was a gift to the city by the late Robert Buist, one of America's famous nurseymen. It is now eleven feet in circumference, equaling in girth some of the old American elms that were in the plot before the revolution. The wood is in great demand in Japan.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

Postmaster Wells, of Hagar, Okla., visited the neighboring town of Shawnee and was run down by a man on horseback. Whereupon the local paper remarked complacently that in Shawnee "people have to step lively if they want to avoid being run over."

While New York State is first in point of population, it is seventh in miles of railroad, according to one authority. Illinois, the third in population, is the greatest railroad State, with nearly 11,000 miles of track. Pennsylvania is second, both in population and in railroad tracks.

Millions are to be expended in the work of deepening Boston harbor, the object being to accommodate the biggest ocean steamers. The bottom there is of tenacious clay, studded with huge bowlders, but it is expected that an additional depth of thirty-five feet will be gained by the work contemplated.

The far Northwest has entered into competition with the Mississippi Valley for the wheat trade of the world. A British steamer has loaded wheat at Tacoma for Liverpool via the Suez Canal. The Cape Horn route is shorter, but is less desirable because of the cost of and difficulty in procuring coal.

Holiday revelers should take warning by the fate of Edward Cosgrove, of 206 Pine street, Philadelphia, and eschew high stand-up collars if convivially inclined. Cosgrove came home intoxicated, sat down at the foot of the stairs and went to sleep. Next morning he was found dead, strangled by his own collar.

The religious papers devoted to the interests of colored people in the South announce that in future they will not print advertisements which are declared to have the effect of straightening kinky hair or of whitening dark skin. One of the papers declares that "the negro who is not contented with his color is a fool."

A great mending of state tapestries will soon begin in France. The task of filling in all of the worm-eaten parts of 233 tapestries will be done at the Gobelin establishment. Of these, ninety hardly hold together. The cost will be $140,000. The work will be spread over twelve years, because there are so few skillful workmen equal to it. The state owns in all 635 tapestries made before the revolution.

Fifteen thousand cannon were used in Italy this year in dissipating hail clouds. A specially prepared gun is employed, and grape growers regard it as an effective weapon. An American consul vouches that hail clouds have often been scattered in this way. In certain localities last summer no hail fell where these guns were used, though in previous seasons heavy losses had been sustained.

Mrs. W. Boyd Steele, of Stephen City, Va., had been missing flour and other things from her pantry. Her husband, who is an amateur photographer, so arranged a camera that if anyone disturbed the flour the photographic plate would be exposed and a snapshot of the thief taken. The Steele family then went calling, and on their return found a very good picture of a neighbor in the act of stealing flour.

It has long been a matter of note that American race horses do not show such speed in England as they have already shown themselves capable of in this country. The theory is now advanced that the trouble lies with the diet rather than with the climate. Accordingly, a California horseman who is shipping a string of horses to England will also ship 100 tons of American hay and put the theory to the test.

D. O. Mills, of New York, has promised the University of California about $24,000 to defray the expenses of a two-years astronomical expedition from the Lick Observatory to South America or Australia, the object of which is to study the movement of stars in the line of sight. The observatory is already indebted to Mr. Mills for the powerful spectograph with which Prof. Campbell within the last three years has made so many important discoveries in binary stars.

While frequent appeals are being made in the United States for the preservation of forest lands, other countries are giving the timber question serious atention. M. Melard, chief of the French forestry bureau, points out in a report that the consumption of timber in the world is greater than the production of the accessible forests, with the obvious result that the governments must soon take measures to preserve their timber lands. Sweden, Norway, Russia, the United States, Canada and other timber-exporting countries are beginning to feel the scarcity.

Robert Williams, of Dayton, Ohio, claims that he has conquered consumption by leading a nomadic life. Twenty years ago his doctor told him he could not live six months. Then he set out to roam over the country. After all these years of wandering he claims to be cured and has returned to his home.

J. W. Vermillion, justice of the peace at Anderson, Ind., was on his way home when he saw one Jack Hevelin, a grown bully, beating a boy. His honor tossed his coat to a bystander, waded into Hevelin, gave him a sound thrashing and brought him to the police station.

Experts sent out by the British South African Company to inquire into the reported find of coal in Rhodesia state that the coal field is situated some 180 miles northwest of Bulawayo, and is known to extend over at least 400 square miles. The seams vary from five to ten feet in width, and, as the coal lies within forty feet of the surface, it will be worked by means of inclines instead of shafts. The coal in some cases compares favorably with the best Welsh coal. It has been decided to take the Cape to Cairo Railroad through the center of the coal fields and on to the Victoria Falls.

Plans for the new botanical school which is to be erected in Schenley Park, Pittsburg, at the expense of Henry Phipps, have been completed. Work on the institution will begin as soon as the weather shall be favorable for excavating for the foundations. This school will be the only one in the United States devoted exclusively to the study of botany, and is to be located with reference to the park conservatory, that the plants there can be made use of for purposes of instruction. The institution is intended for the benefit of the pupils of the public schools as well as for that of private classes.

A TEST OF DEVOTION.

Proof as Declared Most Conclusive by a Married Woman.

"If you want to know whether a man really cares for you devotedly," remarked the matron, "ask him to change the style of collar he wears. If he does it you may flatter yourself you are indeed tenderly beloved. Beside this sacrifice, giving up playing poker or the use of naughty language, foregoing cigarettes and—er—firewaters become but empty compliments.

"You know, of course, that every man early in life selects one certain sort of collar, and, finding it good, sticks to it though the skies fall. The certain sort of collar is always far more remarkable for its comfort than for its beauty. It is usually low and widely open in front to display a scraggly throat, and it is worn alike by the man with the broad, square chin and the man with the pretty round chin, and the man with no chin at all, just as if these differently shaped features didn't require different treatment to bring out their good points.

"Only youngsters wear extraordinary high bands of linen, which threaten to cut off their ears. The mature man, the marrying man has arrived at that stage where he has selected a particular brand, and he sticks to it as he sticks to a certain brand of cigars or his favorite newspaper.

"Once in my life I knew of a case where a member of the sterner sex changed his style of collar at the earnest solicitation of his fiancee," quotes the Baltimore News. "He was a lanky youth with a neck like a telegraph pole, of a sort, indeed, that made even the most dignified persons think 'rubber,' even if they didn't say it, when they first caught sight of its expanse. Naturally this gentleman wore the lowest of turn-down collars, until he became engaged. Then his betrothed declared she positively would not marry him unless he consented to wear a piece of linen three inches high to conceal this neck, in part, at least.

"Well, reluctantly, as a victim led to the slaughter, he consented. He looked really lovely in the new ones, and everybody was apparently satisfied. But the next day after the wedding that perjured villain produced a box of low collars, and has been wearing them ever since. He said the others choked him, and she, poor girl, has no redress, since wearing unbecoming neck linen is not a reason for divorce in this State. The courts are so inconsiderate.

"Now, mind what I say," finished the matron, earnestly, "if you wish to know whether a man really cares for you with blind, unreasoning devotion, don't demand any puerile proof of him, but ask him to change the style of his collar. If he does it you are a lucky girl."

A Lesson in Perseverance.

One of the drollest of anecdotes, possessing what might be termed an "animal subject," was told recently by Lord Ribblesdale at a meeting of Progressives in London. To cheer those who were about to enter the electoral fight, he narrated this fable, which it is no exaggeration to call unmatched even in the pages of the great Aesop himself: Two frogs fell into a bowl of cream. One was an optimist and one a pessimist. The pessimist frog, at once growing hopeless at the general look of his surroundings, let himself sink, to rise no more. Not so, however, the optimist frog. He reflected that he had never been in any such situation before, but that he should do his best to get out of it. And so he swam and swam, and though he soon became convinced that he couldn't possibly emerge from the bowl, he at length grew assured that the fluid through which he paddled was getting thicker. He did not at all understand this state of things, but continued to paddle about, here and there, till at last, lo! he was enthroned securely on a pat of butter which he himself had unwittingly created!—Collier's Weekly.

Utilizes the Garbage.

A number of British cities lease for a long term or purchase outright hundreds of acres of bogland or other waste land for the use of the city. Glasgow has about 800 acres so employed. The city garbage is used for filling in and for fertilizing purposes. In the course of a few years many acres of land are redeemed and made to blossom as the rose. Hay, oats, potatoes and other grains and vegetables are raised and turned in toward the support of the department. These municipal farms are located from two to fifteen miles from the city. The transfer of the refuse to the farms is made by the railway.

Adversity is apt to bring a man out—especially at the knees and elbows.

From the above districting of the State it would appear that Inyo county will for some time to come be in the Democratic column for the Assembly and in the Republican for the Senate—whether we like it or not.

The Hartford Post says "that as the game of football goes on it becomes more and more a contest of trained beef and muscle, and it would be an easy and natural transition to eliminate the ball entirely."

This would make these games simply college prize fights, which they really are.

When we were in college it was a noble game, in which all college students were invited to take part, and the game was largely the kicking of the ball and good running. There was no fighting and no gambling or the acts of rowdyism which are so commonly connected with it at present. It was hugely enjoyed by all who took part in it and those who saw it, and we never heard of an instance in which any student was killed or seriously injured.

All this talk, now so common, about "strenuous life" is simply strenuous humbug. We do not remember ever having heard that any of the distinguished generals (either northern or southern), in our Civil War ever participated in any of these "strenuous" college fights or other "strenuous amusements" which are so strenuously urged by prize-fighters, bull-fighters and the recently elected Vice-President of the United States.—Our Dumb Animals.

The outside saloons have made a great winning by having the Army Canteens abolished. They now will have a monopoly of the liquor business and the soldiers will pour rot down their necks where they formerly got good liquor. This is what is called "a hell of a reform."—City Argus.

To Whip the Editor.

"What are you crying about?" asked a kind-hearted stranger of a lad standing in front of a newspaper office, weeping as if his heart would break.

"Oh, pa's gone up stairs to whip the editor."

"Well, has he come down yet?" pursued the gentle Samaritan.

"Pieces of him have," said the boy, with a fresh burst of tears, "and I'm expecting the rest every minute."—Exchange.

Henry Fehrman to Simon A. Fraser—S ½ of lot 9 and all of lots 11 and 12 in block 27 in Independence—$1,750.

Mary E. Ober to Minerva D. Vermilyea—3 lots in Bishop—$1,000.

M. M. and T. F Hutchison to C. E. Turner—123 acres of land near Bishop—$4,000.

Apricot and some peach trees are in bloom hereabouts.

Spring house-cleaning and gardening is the order of the hour.

David Holland has been in town for the past few days.

County Surveyor Dixon came down from Big Pine Wednesday evening.

The dance at Mr. Baxters last Wednesday night was a social success.

John E. Jones, the miller of Round Valley, was in Independence Thursday

Miss L. Hallengren and Miss L Dodge were up from Lone Pine on Sunday last.

Supervisor Yaney and T. Thomson, of Bishop, were visitors in Independence Tuesday.

The Shakespearian readings at Mairs' hall will commence at 8 o'clock this evening.

Superintendent of Schools, H. C. Hampton, was in town on Tuesday last visiting our school.

Don't forget the Shakespearian readings at Mairs' Hall to-night. Everybody is cordially invited to attend.

S. A. Fraser has purchased the dwelling and blacksmith shop, now occupied by Avah Bell, of Henry Fehrman.

O. I. Mairs, who has been confined to his room for the past ten days by an attack of rheumatism, is improving.

T. C. Boland, of Keeler, has purchased the tanks of the cyanide plant of E. I. Fletcher and has removed them to Cerro Gordo.

Andy Dell and Felix Cardinel passed through town on Sunday last on their way to their Bishop home from Los Los Angeles.

Our townspeople are cleaning up their front yards and are preparing to beautify them still more by an increased amount of flowers and shrubs.

Jas. E Parker, editor and foreman of this paper during Mr Mulholland's absence, has been seriously ill with erysipelas for the past two weeks.

Several of the disciples of Isaac Walton went cat-fishing yesterday. They had fair luck, catching quite a number. Several of them would weigh a pound or more.

A. S Nibecker was over to visit his mining property yesterday, formerly the Barnes claim. He reports the mine as looking well and the mill running steadily.

We have received a supply of garden seeds from Senator Bard, which we will be pleased to distribute to those who desire and will appreciate the same. First come, first served.

Parke and Fred Barnes left here last Saturday morning for Nevada. It is the intention of the gentlemen to do quite an amount of prospecting in Esmeralda county during the season.

Our Lone Pine correspondent informs us that Ben H. Yandell and Wm. D. Dehy visited that settlement on Tuesday last, and that the latter gentleman was Dodging around pretty lively during the day.

J. E. Nolan, President of the Montezuma Mining Co., arrived from the south last Tuesday morning. He reports having received favorable rates from the railroad company. They will ship four carloads of ore on every outgoing train for some time to come.

As depth is attained in sinking the incline in the Eclipse mine the ore body has greatly increased in size and the rock has improved in richness. Enough work has already been done to demonstrate that a large body of ore exists below the lowest workings done by the old Eclipse company. In fact, the ore body, through which the incline is driving, is larger and of better quality than ever encountered in the upper workings. They are making about three feet a day at present in sinking the incline.

About Tonopah.

Several experts have visited Tonapah recently, men of recognized ability and standing, among whom may be mentioned S. A. Harsh of Helena, Montana, a graduate of Yale, Sheffield School of Science. Of nine samples assayed by Mr. Harsh the lowest yield was $45 47 gold and $4 in silver, the highest yield was $434.07 in gold and $1,718 in silver at 60 cents per ounce. Mr. Harsh pronounced it the finest showing from the surface he had ever seen.

The ledges are from two feet to ten feet thick and are in rhyolite porphyry. They stand nearly perpendicular, with smooth hanging and foot walls. The company is sinking two large shafts, 6 by 8 feet, and are down nearly 50 feet, with no change apparently in the value of the ore.

Two hundred thousand dollars, payable in six months, is said to have been offered for the eight company claims, and refused, there being more than that amount in sight.

Louie Peet, (6Kdeuce) who returned from Tonapah Saturday, says there are over 100 men there. All are working, some on lease and others for day's pay. Money is plentiful and poker games run every day. Provisions are scarce, owing to the difficulty of getting in supplies. One restaurant is in operation, and it is doing a big business.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

Another Good Man Gone.

After a long and tedious illness John Kispert passed away at his residence at George's Creek, on Wednesday, February 27th, at half past eight o'clock in the evening.

Mr Kispert came into Owens valley in 1859, at that time teaming to Los Angeles. In 1861 he returned to the valley and located permanently on the premises where he remained until his death. In 1868 he returned to Minnesota and married the wife who now survives him. Of this marriage five children, Mrs. Annie McGovern, Mrs. Sarah Blaney, Miss Ida Kispert, John and Charles Kispert still survive him, and are now living in this county.

As a husband and father John Kispert was nearly perfect; as a citizen he had no peer, an honest, upright man whose loss to the community will be sorely felt. The bereaved family seem indeed to have had more than their share of affliction as twice since the first of January has death invaded their home.

If kindly wishes and expressions of sincere sympathy could lighten their burden it would be easier for them to bear.

He was a native of Bavaria, aged 65 years and 28 days.

Chapter on Pants

"Pants are made for men and not for women. Women are made for men and not for pants. When a man pants for a woman and a woman pants for a man they are a pair of pants. Such pants don't last. Pants are like molasses—they are thinner in hot weather and thicker in cold. Men are often mistaken in pants; such mistakes are breeches of promise. There has been much discussion as to whether pants is singular or plural. Seems to us when men wear pants it is plural, and when they don't wear any pants it is singular. Men get on a tear in their pants and it is all right; when the pants go on a tear it is all wrong. If you want to make pants last make the coat and vest first.—Exchange

The L. O. L. Club entertained Supt H. C. Hampton and a few of their friends at the residence of their instructor, Mrs. Leora B. Rhine, on Tuesday evening last. Various selections of music on the violin and piano, interspersed with games amused the guests for the evening. The Club takes up astronomy with physical geography on Tuesday evenings and literature and rhetoric on Saturday evenings. All the young ladies are very much interested in their work and are making great progress. The Club was adjourned by the President, Miss Irma Webb, at 11:30 o'clock.

The Assessor has mailed to each taxpayer in the county an Assessment List for the year 1901, and would be pleased to have the tax-payers list thereon their property and mail list to his office at Independence, at an early a date as possible. The statement also contains an official demand for Poll Tax of the taxpayer and those in his employ. Get on the good side of the Assessor by attending to this matter promptly.

W. M. Inman, a miner living here, has secured a patent on a sack holding device. It is very simple and can be adjusted with a thumb screw for small or large sacks. It is bound to be popular as its very simplicity is its strongest recommendation. We hope he will make a good thing out of it.—Randsburg Miner.

Mr. Inman was a former resident of Bishop and is well known in this county. His friends here wish him a fortune out of his device.

S. A. Fraser has opened the blacksmith shop next door south of Mairs' livery stable. Mr. Fraser is a skilled workman and is prepared to do all work in the blacksmithing line, light or heavy, that can be done outside of a well-equipped machine shop. He solicits a share of the public patronage.

A. M. Squires, Supt. of the Mazourka M. & W. Co., was in town a few days ago. He reports the outlook as flattering for a good yield of gold from their drift diggings as soon as tanks and pipe line are finished so as to furnish water for sluicing. He has lately increased his working force.

FOR SALE.—Part of four lots—berries and fruit. House of four rooms with kitchen basement. Rooms ceiled and closets. Price, $550 cash, $600 on time. Also upright piano, Standard make, cheap. Furniture, etc.

JOHN J. MCLEAN,

Hot Stuff.

In a little country school not far from Princeton literary exercises are regularly indulged in every Friday afternoon during the term. A 12-year-old boy read an original essay on "The Newspaper." This latter day youthful Solomon treats his subject thusly: "Newspapers are sheets of paper on which stuff to read is printed. The men look over the paper to see if their names is in it and the women use it to put on shelves and sich. I don't know how newspapers came into the world. I don't think God does. The Bible says nothing about editors and I never heard of one being in heaven. I guess the editors is the missing link them fellers talk about. The first editor I ever heard of was the feller who wrote up the flood. He has been here ever since. Some editors belong to church and some try to raise whiskers. All of them raise hell in their neighborhood and all of them are liars, at least all I know, and I only know one. Editors never die. At least I never saw a dead one. Some times the paper dies and then people feel glad but some one starts it up again. Editors never went to school because editors never got licked. Our paper is a mighty poor one, but we take it so ma can use it on our pantry shelves. Our editor don't amount to much, but paw says he had a poor chance when he was a boy. He goes without underclothes in winter, wears no socks and has a wife to support him. Paw hasn't paid his subscription in five years and don't intend to."—Princeton Record.

MISS FRANCES M. ANDERSON, daughter of HON. JUDGE ANDERSON, of Virginia, is at present in Washington, D. C., as Corresponding Secretary of the Higher Educational League, of that city. Cured of la grippe by Peruna.

MISS FRACES M. ANDERSON, Corresponding Secretary of the Higher Educational League, writes from the "Astoria," Washington, D. C., the following:

"About two months ago I was taken very ill with la grippe and was obliged to go to bed. I took three bottles of Peruna with very beneficial results, and was able to leave my bed in a week and regained my usual strength very soon;

"I have nothing but praise for Peruna, and recommend it to those similarly afflicted whenever I can."—Frances M. Anderson.

La grippe is, strictly speaking, epidemic catarrh—that is to say, a variety of acute catarrh which is so contagious and runs a course more or less definite, the same as scarlet fever, whooping cough, etc.

During the acute stages of la grippe it is not a very fatal disease, but the condition in which it leaves the system has caused the death of a countless number.

Indeed nearly every person who has had la grippe within the last three years finds himself more or less deranged by the pernicious effects of this disease. The majority of those who have escaped death find life scarcely worth living.

If this vast multitude of people could only know with what certainty and promptness Peruna would relieve them of all the bad effects which la grippe has brought upon them, what an untold amount of suffering would be averted!

Thousands have already heard how quickly this remedy will cure in these cases and have been saved; but tens of thousands have not yet heard, and continue to suffer on, dropping into the grave one by one.

Peruna cures catarrh in all stages and varieties, whether acute or chronic, and is therefore the most effective remedy ever devised for removing all the derangements which follow la grippe.

Samuel M. York writes from Union Grove, Ala., the following lettter:

Dear Sir—"Last week I was taken with la grippe and catarrhal deafness. I wrote you for advice and followed your directions. After taking two bottles of Peruna I found myself well of la grippe, and my hearing was fully restored. My health is better than it has been in five years.

"My wife improved in health very much after taking Peruna."—Samuel M. York.

Miss Caroline J. Kahl, Otisco, Ind., writes as follows:

"Three years I had la grippe and pulmonary trouble. I was very sick. I had hemorrhages of the lungs nearly every day for a year, and three bottles of your Peruna cured me. The doctor said I had consumption. I am now in better health than I have been for many years.

"I highly recommend Peruna to all my neighbors and friends. Peruna is my favorite medicine. I shall always have Peruna in the house."—Miss Caroline J. Kahl.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case, and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

A Mountain Accident.

A serious seeming accident with a fortunate termination is reported by a western exchange.

A man and his wife, while driving along a mountain road in Oregon, met with a curious mishap. The wagon was overturned, and the occupants fell out. The woman dropped into the branches of a tree 50 feet below, and the man went sliding and bumping fully 300 feet to the bottom of a ravine.

When he recovered his senses, he was comparatively unhurt and went to his wife's rescue, but it was an hour before he could extricate her from where she hung by her skirts.

THE FIRST GERMAN PAPER.

Ben Franklin In 1732 Printed the First Zeitung In America.

The first newspaper printed in the German language in America was the Philadelphische Zeitung, published by Benjamin Franklin in the year 1732. The Pennsylvania Gazette for June 8-15, 1732, contains the following announcement:

"The Gazette will come out on Monday next and continue to be published on Mondays.

"And on the Saturday following will be published Philadelphische Zeitung, or Newspaper in High Dutch, which will continue to be published on Saturdays once a fortnight, ready to be delivered at Ten a Clock, to Country Subscribers. Advertisements are taken in by the Printer hereof, or by Mr. Louis Timothee, Language Master, who translates them."

In undertaking this new enterprise Franklin expected to secure a liberal support from the German population of the province, for whom he had been doing considerable printing, but in this he was disappointed, and the publication of the Zeitung was discontinued after a few numbers had been issued.

The Zeitung was a small sheet of four pages, 6½ by 9 inches, the text printed in double columns with Roman type, and at the bottom of the fourth page bore the imprint: "Philadelphia: Gedruckt bey B. Francklin in der Marck-strasse, wo diese Zeitungen vor 5 Shillings des Jahrs zu bekommen, und Advertisements zu bestellen sind." The first number was issued June 10, 1732, and the second "Sonnabend den 24. Juni, 1732." The publication of the Zeitung, therefore, antedates by seven years the Hoch-Deutsch Pennsylvanische Geschicht-Schreiber, published by Christopher Saur.—Chicago Times-Herald.

HIS HAT AND UMBRELLA.

This Man Took a Quick Luncheon Sign at Its Word.

He was undoubtedly from the country. His umbrella, a big cotton affair, would have given him away even had he not had one trousers leg tucked into a boot. He wandered into one of the big quick luncheon places in lower Broadway. He was looking for something to eat and was just sitting down at a table when his eye caught a sign which read: "Watch Your Hats! The Management Will Not Be Responsible For Umbrellas and Hats Unless Checked by the Cashier."

"Where's this here cashier?" he asked the woman who came to wait on him.

"Up there in the little cage by the door," said the waitress.

The farmer stalked to the cashier's desk and laid down his umbrella and a big hat that was new five or six years ago. The cashier looked up in amazement.

"Keep your hat," she said. "It will be all right."

The farmer walked back to his table, read the sign again and thought it over. Then he climbed on a chair and took the sign from its hook. He carried it up to the cashier.

"What does this mean?" he asked.

People were beginning to laugh, and the pretty cashier got red in the face. She took the hat and umbrella and wrote out a receipt. It was the first time in her life that she had been asked to check a hat, and she has been a cashier more years than one.—New York Tribune.

Her Own Selection.

Through oceans of remnants and ribbons the puffing big woman towed the meek little man.

"What in the world shall I send her, John?" she blustered. "Come, suggest something that would please Aunt Betsy. Something inexpensive. Why don't you say something?"

"Stationery, books or workboxes," suggested the meek little man.

"Nothing of the kind. You couldn't select a present for the ashman. I will look at some of those fancy boxes of soap."

They were before the soap counter, and she had her finger on an elaborate box containing six round cakes of white soap.

"Fancy and perfumed!" she said, lifting a cake. "The very thing that would please her the most. You may wrap that up, miss!"

"But, my dear," protested the meek little man.

"You just keep quiet. I don't care for any suggestions from a person without taste."

"Really"—

"Keep quiet, John Tenbrook!"

It seemed as if her voice had penetrated every corner of the great store, and the little man shrank away in mortification.

* * * * * * *

"Well, John, what did she say about the little gift? Something nice, I know."

"She returned it."

"What?"

"Yes; you will find a note in the box."

She unfolded the missive and read:

"Niece—I return the box of shaving soap. I am a little too old to appreciate the joke of being called the 'Bearded Lady.' Your Aunt Betsy."—Chicago News.

A Bit of Red Tape.

The absurdities of officialism have perhaps never been better illustrated than by the incident in the career of Lord Shaftesbury which the author of "Collections and Recollections" relates:

One winter evening in 1867 he was sitting in his library in Grosvenor square, when the servant told him that there was a poor man waiting to see him. The man was shown in and proved to be a laborer from Clerkenwell and one of the innumerable recipients of the old earl's charity.

He said, "My lord, you have been very good to me, and I have come to tell you what I have heard." It appeared that at the public house which he frequented he had overheard some Irishmen of desperate character plotting to blow up Clerkenwell prison. He gave Lord Shaftesbury the information, to be used as he thought best, but made it a condition that his name should not be divulged. If it were, his life would not be worth an hour's purchase.

Lord Shaftesbury pledged himself to secrecy, ordered his carriage and drove instantly to Whitehall. The authorities there refused, on grounds of official practice, to entertain the information without the name and address of the informant. These, of course, could not be given. The warning was rejected, and the jail was blown up.—Youth's Companion.

She Was Ahead.

Marjorie had just returned from a visit to the old homestead in Tennessee, where a colored nurse nearly 100 years old was still an inmate. It puzzled her that Chloe should be called "auntie" by her mother and the family, but at last she accepted the fact and did likewise. Her playmates, trooping in to welcome her home, began to enumerate their possessions acquired during her absence.

"I've got a black pony," crowed Charlie exultantly.

"I've got a new baby brother," cried Jessie.

"M'm! That's nothing; I've got two of 'em," retorted Fred.

Marjorie's eyes flashed. "Oh!" she cried. "I've got a heap more'n that; I've got an auntie as old as Mefusela and black as tar."—Leslie's Weekly.

Fate of Old Overcoats.

"Where do the old overcoats go?" is a query that is a natural successor to the old riddle, "Where do the flies go in winter?" The old overcoats seem somehow to fade away, no one knows just how. The overcoat starts its career on the back of its owner, who paid $45 for it. It keeps him warm and shelters him from cold winds and from storms until it commences to get frayed at the edges and the pockets are torn down the sides. Then the owner uses the coat for rainy days only, and no more does he take it to call on his fiancee or to recline on the back of a chair while he is reading at the club. He keeps it another summer, and the moths get into it, and when he takes it out in the fall it has holes here and there. So the owner gives it to the janitor, if the janitor is not a cold, haughty man, and the janitor wears it awhile until his wife gives it to the tramp who wheeled out the three barrels of ashes. The tramp wears it until the old coat commences to fall apart. Then he gives it to another tramp, and it falls apart still more. And then some day the coat has entirely disappeared. No one knows how or when. The coat just simply faded away. That's all anybody knows about it.—Chicago Tribune.

SURE TO FOLLOW

If the Blood Is Impoverished Diseases Which Often Puzzle Doctors Are Inevitable.

From the Tribune, Webster City, Ia.

Physicians are often puzzled by an ailment that does not yield to the usual remedies, patients are caused much suffering and expense while experiments are being tried upon them, when in many cases the seat of the disorder is in the blood. If this vital fluid is impoverished disease is sure to follow. Build up the blood, the diseased part is nourished and strengthened, and health results. This is the simple history of what often appears to be a complicated case. Mr. Ezra Edwards, the well-known merchant of Webster City, Iowa, passed through such an experience. He says:

"I have always believed that my trouble was due to the impoverished condition of my blood. About four years ago my ankles began to swell and cause me great pain. I am quite heavy and as I was on my feet constantly I suffered intensely. Finally the swelling became so bad that I could not walk and for a week I was confined to my chair or bed. Three doctors treated me but did not effect a cure.

"I first heard of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People through an advertisement in a religious paper. About six months ago I began taking the pills and I felt good results from the first box. I continued taking them as directed for nearly five months. I am now 42 years old and am the picture of health. I am willing to tell the world that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cured me and I know they will cure others if they are given a thorough trial.

"Hardly a day passes that I do not tell some one of the benefits I have received from Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, for I think that anyone suffering from any disorder of the blood or nerves should give them a thorough trial.

A Chinese Curiosity.

"A Chinaman in San Francisco," says a gossiper in the Philadelphia Record, "showed me once an ivory ball as big as your two fists, with six smaller balls inside it. It was the most wonderful thing I ever saw. The Chinaman said that the balls had been begun by his grandfather and that he was the third generation to work on them. He told me how the work was done.

"It begins with a solid block of ivory, which is turned into a ball and then carved in a latticed pattern with tiny saw toothed knives. Through the lattice, with other knives that are bent in various shapes, the second ball is carved, but is kept fast to the first one by a thin strip of ivory left at the top and by another left at the bottom. Then the third ball, with still finer knives, is tackled through the first and second ones, and so the work goes on till all the balls are finished, when the strips that hold them firm are cut away, and they all revolve freely, one inside the other.

"This Chinaman said it was a common thing for families to have such balls for hundreds of years—grandfather, father, son and grandson working on them when they had nothing else to do. They are priceless, of course. Some cheap balls are made of vegetable ivory, being carved while the material is soft, like a potato. These, though, are not worth more than a few dollars at the most."

The Evolution of the Pocket.

The ancient wore a single pouch at his belt. The modern has—how many pockets in an ordinary costume for outdoors? Let us count them: In the trousers five, in the waistcoat five, in the jacket five, in the overcoat five, making 20 in all, a full score of little pokes or bags, and arranged so conveniently that they are scarce noticed.

Truly this is an evolution! How long may it be before we have pockets in our hatbands—where the Irishman carries his pipe, the American soldier his toothbrush and internally the pettifogger his legal papers, the papers that his predecessors in England thrust into the typical "green bag?" How long before there may be pockets in our gloves—for there are, I believe, patents covering this invention—and in our shoes? The cane also, with its screw top, begins to be a useful receptacle.

Two centuries from now, so the man with a long foresight can clearly see, the main idea underlying the wearing of clothes will have entirely changed. The chief purpose of garments will no longer be considered to protect the body. They will be regarded first of all as textile foundations for innumerable pockets.—Tudor Jenks in Woman's Home Companion.

Peculiarities of X Rays.

There are many curious things about X rays which seem to puzzle even the scientists. Signor Briguiti, who has been making experiments with them at Rome, says that the visibility of a substance to the eye is no criterion of its visibility to the X rays. The rays cannot see through glass, which is transparent to the eye, whereas aluminium, which is opaque to the eye, is transparent to the X rays. The rays can see a splinter of glass in the hand, but not a splinter of wood. Most inks are transparent to the rays, including printer's ink, but some of them are opaque. The rays can see through a postoffice directory, but if a paper with words written on it be put in the middle of the directory the rays will reveal these words and nothing behind them.

Sometimes.

"Do you subscribe to this statement that a woman ought to look up to her husband?" inquired Mr. Meekton's wife.

"Well, Henrietta," he answered cautiously, "I do think that when there is any picture hanging or anything like that going on in the house it's a man's duty to assume the position of perilous responsibility at the top of the stepladder."—Washington Star.

Her Wedding "Tower."

An accommodation train on a distant railroad was dragging along, when a long, lean and sallow woman, in what appeared to be subdued bridal finery, leaned across the aisle of the car and said seriously to a lady sitting opposite her:

"Dear me! It's a kind of a solemn thing to be travelin with two husbands, now, nin't it?"

"I do not know what you mean," replied the lady.

"Oh, mebbe not. Well, you see, my first husband died 'bout a year ago an was buried over in Patrick county, an last week I was married ag'in, an me an my second husband have been over in Patrick county on a little weddin tower, an I thought I'd kind of like to have my first husband buried in the graveyard nigh where I'm goin to live now, an my second husband was willin, so we tuk my first husband up, an he's in the baggage car along with our other things. My second husband is settin out on the platform takin a smoke, an I been settin here thinkin how solemn it is to go on a weddin tower with two husbands. It's a turrible solemn piece of bizness when you come to think of it."—Laurence Lee in Lippincott's Magazine.

Why Cables Get Tired.

There has been some question, says The Electrical Engineer, as to the reason why certain cables lose their conducting properties and have in some instances to be replaced. A learned Frenchman has submitted a paper on the subject to the Academie des Sciences. In this paper he states that when cables lose their electrical properties it is because they are always used for one kind of current only, either positive or negative. If used sometimes for positive and sometimes for negative, they will, he states, preserve their conductive qualities indefinitely. Experiments with nine wires running from Paris to Dijon demonstrated this, he says.

Unsympathetic.

"You haven't much sympathy for the request from your employees for shorter hours."

"Not much," answered Mr. Cumrox. "It goes to show that men don't know when they are well off. If they had been invited around to musicales and dragged through Europe by Mrs. C. and the girls like I have, maybe they'd appreciate the privilege of staying in a nice, comfortable, businesslike office nine or ten hours a day."—Washington Star.

Still Anxious.

"Have you fastened the windows, dear?" she asked, as they were about to retire for the night.

"No. What's the use? I gave you the last dollar I had to buy that new hat, and we needn't fear burglars."

"But they might sit down on the hat, you know."—Washington Post.

Seeds and Plants.

The Cox Seed Company of 411-413-415 Sansome street has issued its annual illustrated catalogue of seeds and plants. Artistically and typographically it is a perfect specimen of the printer's art. It contains a complete price list of all the seeds and plants grown on the Pacific Coast. The Cox Seed Company is among the largest growers and dealers of the best seeds and plants in the West, and their business is rapidly increasing owing to the fact that growers are giving the preference to native grown seeds over the Eastern product.

To Avoid a Total Loss.

A Pittsburg man tells of a visit he made at a thrifty home in a nearby town. The call was quite a pleasant one and during the evening "Abey," the hopeful son of the family, was sent to the cellar for refreshments for the guests. He could be heard groping his way through the dark, and then came the noise of something falling and the crash of glass. "Abey's" mother was plainly uneasy, but she assumed the unnatural composure which her society duties demanded. Soon "Abey" came up with an armful of bottles.

"What was that noise we heard, 'Abey'?" asked the mother.

"Nothing much," replied "Abey." "I knocked over a bottle of milk and it rolled down the steps and spilled."

"Did you call the cat, 'Abey'?" asked the thrifty woman.—Pittsburg News.

Eruptions

Dry, moist, scaly tetter, all forms of eczema or salt rheum, pimples and other cutaneous eruptions proceed from humors, either inherited, or acquired through defective digestion and assimilation.

To treat these eruptions with drying medicines is dangerous.

The thing to do is to help the system discharge the humors, and to strengthen it against their return.

Hood's Sarsaparilla permanently cured J. G. Hines, Franks, Ill., of eczema, from which he had suffered for some time, and Miss Alvina Wolter, Box 212, Algona, Wis., of pimples on her face and back and chafed skin on her body, by which she has been greatly troubled. There are more testimonials in favor of this great medicine than can be published.

BAD BLOOD, BAD COMPLEXION.

The skin is the seat of an almost endless variety of diseases. They are known by various names, but are all due to the same cause, acid and other poisons in the blood that irritate and interfere with the proper action of the skin.

To have a smooth, soft skin, free from all eruptions, the blood must be kept pure and healthy. The many preparations of arsenic and potash and the large number of face powders and lotions generally used in this class of diseases cover up for a short time, but cannot remove permanently the ugly blotches and the red, disfiguring pimples.

Eternal vigilance is the price of a beautiful complexion when such remedies are relied on.

Mr. H. T. Shobe, 2704 Lucas Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., says: "My daughter was afflicted for years with a disfiguring eruption on her face, which resisted all treatment. She was taken to two celebrated health springs, but received no benefit. Many medicines were prescribed, but without result, until we decided to try S. S. S., and by the time the first bottle was finished the eruption began to disappear. A dozen bottles cured her completely and left her skin perfectly smooth. She is now seventeen years old, and not a sign of the embarrassing disease has ever returned."

S. S. S. is a positive, unfailing cure for the worst forms of skin troubles. It is the greatest of all blood purifiers, and the only one guaranteed purely vegetable.

Bad blood makes bad complexions.

SSS purifies and invigorates the old and makes new, rich blood that nourishes the body and keeps the skin active and healthy and in proper condition to perform its part towards carrying off the impurities from the body.

WHY DO WE WAIT?

Why do we wait till ears are deaf
Before we speak our kindly word,
And only utter loving praise
When not a whisper can be heard?

Why do we wait till hands are laid
Close-folded, pulseless, ere we place
Within them roses sweet and rare,
And lilies in their flawless grace?

Why do we wait till eyes are sealed
To light and love in death's deep trance—
Dear, wistful eyes—before we bend
Above them with impassioned glance?

Why do we wait till hearts are still
To tell them all the love in ours,
And give them such late meed of praise,
And lay above them fragrant flowers?

How oft we, careless, wait till life's
Sweet opportunities are past,
And break our "alabaster box
Of ointment" at the very last!

O! let us heed the living friend
Who walks with us like common ways,
Watching our eyes for look of love,
And hungering for a word of praise!

GRANNY AND THE GYM.

SAY we charge admission and use the money for some fun for this summer—camping or houseboat or something," said Bert Stone, folding his legs up comfortably on his toboggan cushion and looking triumphantly at his companions.

"Bully idea!" exclaimed "Shorty" Harris, who was very tall and very slim, and appropriately nicknamed by his crowd, "to try and hold him down," they claimed. They were talking about a toboggan carnival they were arranging, to be held on the toboggan slide the boys had themselves built. They had all chipped in and bought the lumber and built the slide back of Bert Stone's home, as it had a wide and deep lawn that extended back to the next street. The big public slides were larger, of course, but they were some distance out of the center of the city; the Stone home was central and the grounds around gave them a slide that was a block in length. "Don't take till the queen's birthday to get back to the top," the boys cried, with pride and satisfaction, when they had completed their work and surveyed the tall structure rising, airy but strong, above the snow. The "shoots" were carefully constructed and flooded till they glistened smoothly with solid ice. The inclined walk and stairs were solid and well railed, and the boys and many of the "grown-ups" had put in a lively winter with the slide. The long Canadian season had been up to the mark and not a thaw had come to spoil the fun. Now they were planning a carnival as a fitting climax before spring got in with her meddlesome fingers and spoiled their work.

GRANNY WAS OVERCOME.

"Gee! We might make enough to fit up a gym," cried Jack Carter, enthusiastically. "Punchin' bag and table, flyin' rings, turnin' pole—oh, mamma!" And we could all divvy up for the rest. I've got the boxing gloves and old Bob here has a pair of foils and the masks Christmas——"

"And we've got a daisy pad for the floor, that the guv'nor used to have," broke in Reo Jordan, excitedly.

"And clubs. Who——" "I have!" cried West Franklin, tripping over his toboggan and landing full length in front of Bob Ellis, who promptly sat on him. "Let me up, you elephant!" he added, indignantly.

"Say 'please, sir,'" prompted Bob gently.

"Please nothin'," said West, upsetting Bob with a sudden twist, then washing his face with snow.

"Time!" "Give it to 'im!" "Go it, Bobby!" yelled the boys as four legs and considerable snow flew in the air. Then there was a call for order, Stone thumped the struggling pair apart with his toboggan pad and the meeting came to order once more.

"Franklin has clubs and we've all got lots of stuff we could fix up with," said Stone. "And the gym seems about the best plan. What do you all say?"

There was a noisy assent. It was decided to charge admission, the proceeds to go toward fitting up a gymnasium for the use of those who had helped pay for and build the toboggan slide. Arrangements went forward gayly; the boys invited all their friends—schoolmates and "grown-ups"—adding that it would cost them a quarter to "get in the percession," and at last the night of the "carnival" came. It was clear and cold and sparkling. A big moon generously helped out by flooding everything in silver light, in which the long festoons of Chinese lanterns that decorated the toboggan slide gleamed rosily and bravely. Boys and girls flashed up and down; bright spots of color on the bright snow in their manyhued blanket coats, the woolen scarfs that bound their waists and their long tasseled toboggan caps flying in the air as they shot down the slide like some brilliantly dyed arrow, then out on the long stretch of ice and snow that gleamed ahead.

Under the slide a good-sized shed had been built, in which hot coffee, sandwiches and crispy fried cakes were served to the hungry coasters, who came in laughing and noisy relays, being reminded constantly by their hosts to "stack yer toboggans outside, you duffers; there's no room in here. Do you want to upset the coffee? Quit crowdin' now!"

Cheeks glowed with the frosty night air and eyes sparkled brightly, while they joked and chaffed and all talked at once. It was generally known what the boys intended doing with the money taken in at their "carnival," and many questions were asked the busy and not over-patient cooks and waiters about the gym.

"No; it won't be for girls. Maybe we will have a ladies' day once in awhile," said West Franklin in answer to the anxious questions put to him by some of the long-braided tobogganers. "We can have a hop or something every few weeks that you girls can come to, but girls always get jealous over the other girls' togs and things and kick up ructions, and we ain't going to take chances."

And Mr. Franklin wiped his heated face with the tea towel and grinned, quite unmoved, while a shrill chorus of girl voices told him he was a hateful, selfish old thing and they wouldn't go to his old hops and they hoped he would just break his neck in his nasty old gymnasium; so there!

But the carnival was lots of fun and the grown-ups came in great force and money rolled in at the treasury while coffee and doughnuts rolled out of the kitchen.

Next afternoon the meeting was called to order at the foot of the slide, and "Shorty" Harris, the treasurer, was asked for his report. The treasurer arose, took a dignified attitude, cleared his throat, and in a solemn voice, suitable to the occasion, read this report, made out on the flyleaf of a very much battered algebra.

"Coffee, donated by Mr. and Mrs. Stone; sugar, donated by Mr. and Mrs. Jordan; cream, donated by Mr. and Mrs. Ellis; butter, donated by my folks; lanterns, donated by Hunter's stationery store; bread, ham, tongue, mustard, fried-cakes and dishes, donated by the club members' folks' generally; club's expenses for carnival, none; balance left in treasury from box office receipts, $47.50."

There was a Comanche howl of astonishment and delight that brought everybody in the neighborhood to their windows, and through the uproar Bert Stone's voice could be heard shouting for "Order!"

"Will you shut up, you Indians?" he exclaimed.

"Shorty, where in thunder did we get all that money?"

"Why, it was this way," said Shorty, modestly. I put a sign up at the gate where I took tickets, and it said: "I am too busy to give back any change. Just chip in your coin and slide.' Well, the kids had their even quarters, but the grown-ups read the sign and laughed and went down into their pockets for big money. See? So we made considerable more than we expected."

The club's joyous appreciation of this business enterprise fell on Shorty's back with a hearty shower of boy thumps that landed him in a snowbank, from which he arose snowy and indignant.

"That's all right," he cried, dodging behind the slide as they made another dive for him; "I'll take your word for it. You send me a valentine if you like, but cut it out just now, see!"

So the boys hugged each other and danced a few turns in the snow and pummeled each other delightedly, and then at last sat down to talk it all over. They finally settled how the money was to be spent, and the meeting was just breaking up as little Willie Summers came breathlessly running down the street and stopped at the gate to tell "the fellers" the news.

Old Granny Jenks—or "Whisky Jenks," as she was sometimes called—had just been burnt out. Her little shanty was near the schoolhouse and she was well known to the boys. Old granny was very poor, but she clung to her little tumble-down house and flatly refused to go to the poorhouse, and would sometimes use rather profane language when people would insist that it was the proper place for her. This gave her a bad name among the good people of the town and they would not have anything to do with her. But she liked the boys and told them many a long story about war times and Indians, while she puffed her little pipe. And the Toboggan Club boys carried her tobacco and things to eat at odd times. And they knew how granny dreaded dying in the poorhouse. She had no rent to pay and gathered her own firewood, and with what the boys took her she seemed to get along somehow.

Now she was burned out.

"Every stick and rag," cried Willie, with his eyes big. "And she's yellin' an' howlin'—my!"

The boys were silent and Willie looked surprised. Bert Stone stared down at his boots and whistled softly. Shorty Harris kicked the snow against the gatepost and thrust his hands deep in his pockets. Soon Stone looked up suddenly and met the eyes of the rest of the boys fixed on him anxiously.

"Poor old Whisky! It's kind o' tough, eh?" said Bob Ellis, softly. "Hadn't we better—better—" The boys all moved uneasily and then sighed. The sigh relieved the tension and they all seemed to agree suddenly.

"Yes, let's—the gym can wait— come on!"

Willie stared. The boys, with Stone and Shorty in the lead, sprinted down the street. And twenty minutes later poor old Granny Jenks was gazing, open-mouthed and silent, at the sum of $47.50 that lay in a little heap of crinkled bills and loose silver in her faded gingham apron.

* * * * * * * * *

But that wasn't the end of it.

Granny Jenks said very little. She sheltered her gray head in another little shanty and settled down quite contentedly with her pipe. The boys brought her things to eat and wear as usual. She frequently "yarned" by the hour while they popped corn at her little stove. She did not mention the money, but she seemed so happy at not going to the poorhouse the boys were quite satisfied. And, like all boys, they hated being thanked for anything, anyhow.

Spring and summer came and passed. Old granny grew very feeble. Fall brought thoughts of trying some scheme again for the long-desired gym. And the boys talked of "another carnival, may be, when winter came." Granny would listen and nod her head and chuckle in her queer old way. But she would say little. And one day she said nothing. They found her asleep in the comfortable rocker the boys' money had bought her, before her little fire and with the stubby pipe in her quiet fingers. And when charitable hands prepared her for her last home, where there was no more dread of the poorhouse forever, they found hidden in her clothing a little roll of bills that amounted to $270. It was wrapped in granny's will, which read: "Fer the byes that giv me the munny wen i burnt, fer ter bild ther Jim."—Chicago Record.

RANGE OF THE HONEY BEE.

How the Distance Traveled by the Bees Can Be Determined.

The range of the honey bee is but little understood by the masses, many supposing that bees go for miles in quest of nectar, while others think that they go only a short distance. It may be curious to many to understand how any one can tell how far the bees may fly, but this is simple when understood. Years ago, when the Italian bees were first introduced in the United States, these bees, having marks different to the common bees already here, they were very easily distinguished, and after any bee keeper had obtained the Italian bees they could be observed and their range easily noticed. If bloom is plentiful close where the bees are located they will not go very far, perhaps a mile in range, but if bloom is scarce they may go five miles. Usually about three miles is as far as they may go profitably.

Bees have been known to go as far as eight miles in a straight line, crossing a body of water that distance to land. It is wonderful how the little honey bee can go so far from its home and ever find its way back to its own particular hive. If, while the little bee is out of its home or hive, the hive should be moved some ten to twenty feet, according to the surroundings, when it came back to where its home was first located it would be hopelessly lost. If its home was in an open space with no other objects close, it might find its way home, but even should the hive be moved only a few feet, many of the bees would get lost.

So to move a hive, if done in the winter time, it would be all right, but if in the summer time it should be done after dark, or when the bees are not flying, and even then the bees should be stirred up some, and smoke blown in at the hive entrance, and a board or some object placed in front of the hive, so that the bees in coming out may mark their new location. Bees, no doubt, are guided by sight, and also sense of smell. They are attracted by the color of bloom, as if they are at work on a certain kind of bloom they are not likely to leave that particular kind of bloom for any other as long as they can find that kind. Again, bees are often attracted to sweets by their sense of smell, for they will go after sweets even if in the dark, if close. However, any kind of sweets may be placed in glass in plain sight, but if covered, so as not to emit any smell, the bees will take no notice of it.—Baltimore American.

Bogged.

While traveling in Cornwall, in 1891, Rev. S. Baring-Gould came near being overwhelmed in a bog. He and his companion got lost, and at dusk found themselves in a bog called Redmire. Six bullocks had already been lost there that year. Mr. Baring-Gould's adventure is related in his "Book of the West."

All at once I sank above my waist, and was being sucked farther down. I cried to my companion, but in the darkness he could not see me, and had he seen me he could have done nothing for me. The water finally reached my armpits.

Happily I had a stout bamboo, some six feet long, and I placed this athwart the surface and held it with my arms as far expanded as possible. By jerks I succeeded in gradually lifting myself and throwing my body forward, till finally I was able to cast myself at full length on the surface. The suction had been so great as to tear my leather gaiters off my legs.

I lay at full length, gasping for nearly a quarter of an hour before I had breath and strength to advance, and then wormed myself along on my breast till I reached dry land. My companion, it turned out, had had a similar experience.

DEFEATED BY A LAUGH

A MAN'S MERRIMENT BRINGS ABOUT HIS CONFUSION.

A Young Lady School Teacher Beats a Man After an Exciting Race of Sixty Miles Over the Ozarks to Save a Schoolhouse.

In the little town of Oakland lives Miss Ida Record, a pretty school teacher, who recently ran a race to the land office with Jim McVey, of the same place, beating him by a fraction of a second, but beating him all the same, to the delight of her friends, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. Miss Record has been the teacher for several years in the village nestled among the Ozarks, just off the bank of the picturesque White River. The residents of the village had succeeded by hard work and many privations in building a substantial schoolhouse. For convenience the teacher lived in a small log house adjacent, with her widowed mother and little sister. There never would have been any question as to the rights of the village in occupying the bit of ground where the schoolhouse is located had it not been for the recent mineral excitement throughout this entire country. This was the incentive which induced the people to look closely to their own and their neighbors' title deeds, and in the course of his investigation Jim McVey discovered that the schoolhouse was built upon land that had never been claimed by anybody. The young man made up his mind to own that bit of land, and so took measures to "homestead" it. The school teacher was told of the intention of the gentleman, and immediately decided that she would present a prior claim to the land, which was of so much value to her as the site of the schoolhouse. The town of Harrison, the seat of the land office, was sixty miles away, over rough mountain roads, but that didn't daunt the little lady, who determined that if McVey was going to take her schoolhouse she would get there first and homestead it herself. She called upon her brother to assist her, and they saddled their horses and the race began, Miss Record patriotically defending the rights of the "little red schoolhouse" and Mr. McVey working for Mr. McVey.

The ride was long and full of dramatic incidents. Upon reaching White River Miss Record learned that McVey had just crossed. She did not wait for the ferryboat, but into the river she urged her horse. He plunged breast high into the stream and swam most of the distance to the other side. Then on to Yellville with foam-flecked sides the horse went, the plucky little rider never hesitating a moment until she had jumped from its back at the door of the clerk's office in this town. The clerk looked at the pretty, flushed face of the lady as she stated her wishes, and it was with real disappointment in his tone that he informed her that McVey had been there five minutes before. "But," said he, "Miss Record, this man's papers have not yet gone to Harrison; and if you can get there before they do you can yet have the land." It was 5 o'clock in the afternoon, but she was ready to mount a fresh horse and begin the thirty-three-mile ride. In the meantime McVey had learned that she and her brother had set out for Harrison, and it didn't take him long to make up his mind to follow them. He arrived at Harrison at about the same time as the others, and they rode up to the land office together, only to learn that the land office would not be open until 9 o'clock the next morning.

In the interval Miss Record had canvassed all the possibilities afforded by technicalties, and long before the hour she was present, having taken her stand at the desk of the recorder. McVey stood before the desk of the receiver. She was in the best humor imaginable, and made several witty remarks at his expense while the recorder waited watch in hand. Finally, he laughed just at the moment the recorder called time, and Miss Record, dropping her papers on his desk, said: "I file these for record." McVey was one moment too late, his laugh having cost him the homestead. Miss Record declares that, as soon as she gets the title, she will deed the school building to the town of Oakland, and although the people of the village feel safe about their schoolhouse, they have cause for regret, as the neighboring town has offered Miss Record more money for her services in its school.

STUFFED PETS.

Taxidermist Says Women Take a Melancholy Pleasure in Them.

"Women take a melancholy pleasure in stuffed pets," said a well-known taxidermist on Sixth avenue to a New York World reporter. "There is a sort of tender, gruesome sentiment about it that pleases them. My principal customers are for this reason women.

"They bring me dead dogs, dead cats, dead birds, and the other day one came in with a little fish out of her aquarium that had come to an untimely end. The queerest order I ever had was to fix up a pet mouse that had died from too much cheese.

"I mount more canary birds than any other pets. They look picturesquely pretty on the mantel.

"'I always have my pets stuffed after they die,' one woman explained, 'because then I can talk to them just the same.'

"The taxidermist, to be successful, must be an artist. He must study live animals, familiarize himself with their pose, the droop of the head, and make the poor dead thing look natural.

"'That doesn't look like my Neddie,' said one of my customers when I mounted a white Java sparrow for her. 'It might just as well be any other sparrow. Why, Neddie had a way of tucking down his head in the cutest way whenever you looked at him. He never threw it back like this.'

"And that one little gesture was the keynote to the individuality of her bird—the one thing in which it differed from all others.

"Men are different. It's trophies of the chase they bring to me; sometimes the skin of a handsome dog, from practical, no sentimental reasons. They want it make into a rug. You can't get a woman to look at a dead pet from a utilitarian standpoint.

"One man came to me one day in great disgust.

"'My wife brought the corpse of a parrot yesterday,' he said. 'Now I've been pestered with that blooming bird for five years, and I don't want it standing around dead, staring at me in triumph. I'll give you $10 just to lose it. When she comes back say it flew away, or the rats got it.'

One little girl crept timidly in here one day with a wee kitten in her hands.

"'I want it fixed up so I can keep it always,' she whispered. 'I guess I squeezed it to death, I loved it so hard, so won't you put sawdust in it so I can hug it all I want to? I like it better than a doll.'"

YOUNG BUT PLUCKY RIDER.

Youth Who Followed the Hounds with the Enthusiasm of a Veteran.

In a hunting community not far from this city there is a son of one of the members who seems destined to throw a famous leg over the pigskin. That is, it will be famous if the recklessness of its owner permits it to come to maturity. His courage is of the first water, his nerve without limit, but he is only 11, and his discretion leaves something to be desired. Once the ardor of the chase is on him, his father says, he will put his "gee" at anything in his path, even if it should happen to be a church. He has until recently ridden to hounds on his pony, but so clever was his work that the attention of the master of fox hounds was attracted, and he gave the boy recently a leg upon one of his own hunters. The horse was rangy, half-bred, 17½ hands high, and with a temper of his own.

After they were in the field the master of fox hounds remembered the hunter's peculiarities of temper, and his heart misgave him. The boy was excited and happy, but he looked a bit lonely and forlorn seated on the huge horse, and the master of fox hounds decided to ride close at hand to keep a careful eye on him. After the hounds found all semed to go well, however, and the master of fox hounds forgot his good intentions as his sporting blood rose. Suddenly he remembered and looked around just in time to see the boy put his mount at a five-barred gate. The horse refused, and up his neck the youngster slid. He grabbed wildly, and his tiny arms went round the horse's neck. So close was the horse that his head was over the gate he had refused, and as the boy slid off he struck the top bar. To this he hung, and as the frightened master of fox hounds rode up he held up his hand. "Please, Mr. Blank, does that count as a fall?" he demanded. "I didn't touch ground." "Why, no, Reggie," said the master of fox hounds, as he disguised a laugh in a cough, "I don't think that ought to count as a fall. Are you hurt?" "Not a bit," was the cheerful response, "and now, if you'll lead him up I'll mount from here and then I won't have to touch ground." He did, and was in at the death, and anything he wants in that club now is his from the best hunter in its stables to the mastership of the hounds when he grows up.—New York Tribune.

Wheeler Was Too Polite.

At Washington the other day it was raining hard, and the street cars were crowded with passengers more or less bedraggled. Among them was General Joe Wheeler. Next to him was a woman wearing a mackintosh, who rose to get off at Fourteenth and F streets. Gen. Wheeler noticed an umbrella leaning against the car seat.

He grabbed the umbrella, ran after the woman, caught her at the door, and said: "Pardon me, madam, but you left your umbrella."

The woman looked puzzled, but took the umbrella. Gen. Wheeler resumed his seat. Then a woman on the other side of him gave a little scream, and said: "Why, you nasty little man, you gave that woman my umbrella." Then she appealed to the conductor.

Gen. Wheeler apologized, but the woman said: "Now you just get right off the car and get it for me or I'll notify the police."

Meekly the veteran of three wars tumbled off into the rain and ran after the woman with the mackintosh. He made a hurried explanation, got the umbrella and rushed back to the waiting car.

As he handed it back to its owner he said: "I trust you will pardon me, madam. I assure you it was all a mistake."

The woman glared at him. "I don't know about that," she sniffed. "I don't believe you are any better than you ought to be."

Sabbath Observance and Rinderpest.

A member of the Volksraad of the Orange Free State, South Africa, recommends Sunday observance as an effectual cure for the rinderpest. Recently, in the course of the debates on the new Sunday observance act of that State, he assured the members that if they only passed a stringent Sabbath law, "rinderpest and all other plagues would vanish, and the land would be one flowing with milk and honey."

If a man can't find work in a year, he might as well quit looking.

JACK JOUETT'S RIDE.

YOUNG INNKEEPER'S WARNING TO THOMAS JEFFERSON.

Another Revolutionary Hero Who, Like Paul Revere, Rode Long and Hard to Warn American Patriots of the Approach of the British.

Paul Revere was not the only man who rode long and hard to warn patriots that the British were coming, in the days when the present entente between England and America was a thing undreamed of. Worthy to rank with it was the adventure of Jack Jouett, a young Charlottesville innkeeper, who rode thirty miles to save Thomas Jefferson from capture. The story is told in the St. Nicholas by R. T. W. Duke, Jr.

Jack shrewdly guessed that Tarleton would follow the highway into the main road that led by the country seats, the homes of the gentry. Jack knew a shorter route, an old disused road that would lead him to the river, thence to Monticello, and then to Charlottesville—not a pleasant road to ride or drive, though as picturesque a route as one often sees; for on either side grew great pine trees here, and massive oaks there, while dogwood and sassafras and sumac filled in spaces. The road had once been a buffalo track and then an Indian trail, then a wagon road for a while; but as no one ever worked it or changed the grade, it rapidly washed into a succession of red gullies and became well-nigh impassable. So it had been abandoned many years, and nature had covered up the scars made by the animals and men, and only in a few places could one have known that it had ever been used as a highway. Broom-sedge grew wherever there was an open space; ferns of a hundred varieties clustered in every hollow where water ran; and the wild bramble ran riot everywhere in the shade. Into this old road Jack pushed his horse, and soon was dashing at full speed over hill and dale. It was a dangerous ride, even at a slow gait. Deep gullies lay concealed under treacherously smiling wild flowers. Ground-hog holes offered pitfalls liable to break the leg of his steed; overhanging limbs swept him in the face, and the wild brier ever and anon caught him in a painful and harassing embrace. His face bore for many years the scars left on it by this brier, which, you know, climbs up trees and seems to throw itself from one to another. But Jack had no time to consider these things. He knew that in a few hours the enemy would be in Charlottesville, and make the Governor and Legislature prisoners, unless he could give them warning. His mare was sure of foot, sound of wind, and no other fox-hunter ever got the brush when Jack and she were in the hunt.

"So away he went, touching her lightly with the spur now and then, but oftener cheering her in the race with a merry whistle or encouraging word. He had thirty miles to make. He could have as easily made fifty on a good road as thirty through this wilderness. At one point the disused road entered a field in sight of the highway along which Tarleton's legion was passing, and a few stragglers saw Jack when he dashed into the open. They followed him with loud shouts and a pistol-shot or two, but when he dashed into the woods they abandoned the pursuit. Once his bay mare fell, her foot having caught in a mass of brush and brier and half-rotten logs; but up she scrambled, and away she went, as if she knew that the fate of a commonwealth depended upon her. In two hours Jack rode his thirty miles, and paused in the ford just opposite the little hamlet of Milton, two miles from Monticello. Only a mouthful of water did he allow his gallant bay to sip, and then he dashed up the river bank and on through the streets of the village, stopping not at anxious hails of men and women, but merely shouting: 'The British are coming! The British are coming!' In ten minutes he drew rein in front of a quaint brick house on top of the now famous mountain. 'He was a sight, too,' the darkies said. His face was torn and bleeding from the wild-brier thorns, his gay blue suit covered with mud and dirt, his mare covered with sweat and foam and panting as if her heart would burst through her sides. Down from the porch in front of which Jack had halted came a tall, thin man, dressed in a suit of nankeen, lace at his wrists and shirt-front, and with a little sword-cane in his hand. This man had clear, sparkling blue eyes; a thin skin under which the blood almost seemed starting. His hair was thin and curly, and covered with white powder. For a moment he did not recognize the rider. Then, as he drew nearer, 'Why, Mr. Jouett,' he said, 'what brings you here, and with your good horse so well-nigh spent?'

"Jack could only gasp, 'The British, Governor! Tarleton and his men passed Cuckoo Tavern at six o'clock this morning.'"

ART STUDENTS OF NEW YORK.

They Live in a Manner Very Unlike That of Paris Students.

The art schools of New York and the life of the students in them is handled in an interesting manner in the Woman's Home Companion in an article entitled "The Girls' Art Schools of New York." As to how the young women students live the author writes as follows:

"There is no absurd dressing among the art students in New York—at least not after they have attended the classes for a day or two; and the popular notion that all art students live in dingy, barren garrets, cook their own meals by means of their oil-lamps, and live generally upon the outer ragged edges, has no ground in fact, so far as the students in New York are concerned. There are some such cases, but they are extremely rare. In the great majority of cases the students, if they cannot afford to pay for the necessities from their own pocketbook, stay away from the city until they can borrow sufficient funds. Many girls with thin purses attend only half-day classes, and work at some commercial occupation the rest of the day. I know of several girls who do enough type-writing in the mornings to pay for their afternoon art lessons and their board besides, while numbers of students work for a salary in the daytime and attend art classes at night only.

"The art students of New York do not seek living-places in any one particular part of the town, as do the students of Paris. The various art schools are in widely separate sections of the city, and as living near to their schools means so much saved in car-fare, the girl students usually live within easy walking distance of their respective classrooms. Possibly 95 per cent of the students board with private families or live in ordinary boarding-houses, where they can secure fair board and room as low as four dollars a week; but seven dollars a week is the average amount charged. The other 5 per cent of the students rent studios of their own, or more often meagerly furnished bedrooms, and take their meals in restaurants; or else three to a dozen of them club together, rent a flat, and hire a servant to cook their meals."

CHILI HAS WOMEN CONDUCTORS

Valparaiso Street Cars Ruled by Fair Girls of Complacent Nature.

The most startling feature of life in the Chilian metropolis that strikes the foreigner is the street-car service. The conductors on the cars are all women, and that in a country where woman has by no means reached the high standing in social and public life of her sisters in the United States.

The girls who run the cars are, with few exceptions, very pretty, and there seems to be little objection to their novel occupation. The male passengers, of course, are pleased, and the few who are not are too polite and gallant to give vent to their sentiments. The female passengers are proud of the fact that this important occupation is in the hands of women.

VALPARAISO WOMAN CONDUCTORS.

The fact is that Valparaiso's female conductors are exceedingly courteous and obliging. They are usually a strong and robust set, and they sympathize especially with women passengers accompanied by children, whom they help board and alight from the cars.

The fair conductresses deserve every cent of their wages, which amounts to about 50 cents per day in United States money. For this they collect all fares and name the streets crossed by the tramway. Nor do they mouth their phrases as do their brothers in New York and Chicago.

On some of the lines leading into the suburbs the conductresses have an easy time. Seats are provided for them in all the cars, and it is not an unusual thing during the dull hours to see them taking it easy, reading novels or the daily papers. They are neatly dressed in black, with white aprons, in the pockets of which they put their money and tickets. They wear broad-brimmed sailor hats.

The bane of their existence are the men inspectors who are detailed to count the pasengers to see that they do not "knock down" fares. They have nicknamed these men "Judases."

An Amused Foe.

The proprietor of a small store in New York owns a black kitten that cultivates a habit of squatting on its haunches, like a bear or a kangaroo, and then sparring with its forepaws as if it had taken lessons from a pugilist. The telegram tells how the kitten conquered a big dog.

A gentleman took into the store an enormous black dog, half Newfoundland, half collie, fat, good-natured and intelligent. The tiny kitten, instead of bolting at once for shelter, retreated a few paces, sat erect on its hind legs and put its "fists" in an attitude of defiance.

The contrast in size between the two was intensely amusing. It reminded one of Jack the Giant Killer preparing to demolish a giant.

Slowly and without a sign of excitability the huge dog walked as far as his chain would allow him and gazed intently at the kitten and its odd posture. Then, as the comicality of the situation struck him, he turned his head and shoulders around to the spectators, and if animal ever laughed in the world that dog assuredly did so then and there. He neither barked nor growled, but indulged in a low chuckle, while mouth and eyes beamed with merriment.

Notice is served on the women that no wrapper ever looks as if it had been built according to the plans and specifications in the fashion book.

An egg is best when fresh, but it's different with an office boy.

IDAY, ARCH 15.....1901

The opening of a new railway line, nearly five hundred miles long, is a notable event, even in these days of marvelous railway development. The official announcement that the Southern Pacific Company will begin to operate its coast line the last of the present month is particularly interesting, because the new road will double railway facilities between Los Angeles and San Francisco. It will practically make this city the terminus of another important railway artery in the group converging here. Los Angeles is not uncommonly called the "Chicago af the Pacific coast." This distinction arises chiefly from the progressive business methods in this city, but it looks as if the analogy might some day extend also to railway expansion. Not that we expect, or even hope, to rival the greatest of all railway centers, but the strides of Los Angeles in that direction are astonishing, when we consider the youth of it as a modern city. And railways, like tourists, are the means of bringing others.—Los Angeles Herald.

March may "come in like a lion" in the East, but its behavior is generally more suggestive of "a bull in a china shop." Nature appears to be in an angry mood in the greater part of the United States east of the mountains. Snowstorms are reported from Minnesota to Florida, together with tornadoes and destructive rains in some sections. Our neghboring State of Texas has again been visited by disaster. Loss oi life has resulted from terriffic storms and immense damage has been done to property. From the farther east we learn that the dreaded spring floods are appearing unusually early in the season. The warm weather preceding the recent storms caused the melting of snow at the headwaters of rivers, followed by the breaking up of the ice. The storms have done the rest, and rivers are reported as swelling to dangerous proportions. Surely the residents of Owens Valley should be content.

Since last Autumn the Navy Department has suspended the experiments in the employment of wireless telegraphy as a means of communication between naval vessels and between vessels and the shore. Up to this time none of the warships have been equipped with a permanent plant. Secretary Wilson, hearing that the Navy was casting about for a serviceable system of telegraphy, has written to Admiral Bradford, chief of the Equipment Bureau, to notify him that the Agricultural Department has been experimenting for some time with wireless telegraphy and has attained remarkable results. His experts assert, with great positiveness, that they have evolved a system radically different from Marconi's and of far greater efficiency. It is probable that within a short time a practical exhibition will be made on board of a naval vessel.

The commanding officer of the army stationed at Dapidan, Mindanao, P. I., has reported to the department the capture of a peculiar deer, native only to that island. The deer is black and its distinctive peculiarity is that it barks and bays like a dog. Permission is asked to send the animal to Washington for the purpose of placing it in the Zoo. The Department has consented to this proposition, and the deer will shortly be shipped.

There have been shipped from Southern California, since November 1, in round figures, ten thousand car loads of oranges and lemons. This is twenty-five hundred carloads more than had been shipped at the same date last year, and is about one-half of the season's crop. The shipments now made exceed the entire output of any season prior to 1897-8.

It is not considered geologically possible for petroleum or its derivatives to arise from one formation to another, the principal deposits being sealed in the containing strata. Surface indications are principally due to uumberless fractures by which the contents of the porus rock can reach the surface.—S. F. Mining and Scientific Press.

Andrew Carnage, the great steel magnate, has his little annoyances. just the same as common folk. His neighbors, it seems, are of an inquisitive turn of mind and stare into his house and grounds. Now Andrew is building a marble wall fifty feet high around his mansion to circumvent the rubbernecks.

McKinley was inaugurated last Monday with extraordinary and almost regal pomp and splendor. Senator Hanna occupied the seat of the retiring President, since there was no one retiring. The President wisely, we think, retains his old Cabinet, but per chance not for long.

"How much do a king get?" asks Huck Finn of Tom Sawyer. The amount varies but there are doubtless several crowned heads who would be willing to swap with the uncrowned head of the steel trust, at a salary of $800,000.

The bill appropriating $250,000 for the purchase of the redwood forest in Big Basin, Santa Cruz county, passed the Assembly by a vote of 55 to 1—Speaker Pendleton's being the only negative vote.

An oak tree of average size, with 700,000 leaves, lifts from the earth into the air about 123 tons of water during the five months it is in leaf.

BORN.

WALTER—In Independence, March 14, 1901, to the wife of Carl J. Walter—a daughter.

J. Harry Cole came up from Lone Pine yesterday.

W. K. Miller, the stage man, was in Independence Thursday.

Chas. Anthony came in from Darwin last Tuesday on land business.

Unless there is a frost to come, there will be a great crop of fruit this year.

Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Gunn came in from the Minnietta mine on Tuesday last.

Domingo Etcharren, of Ballarat, was in town for a couple of days during the week.

P. D. Canning, formerly section foreman at Bishop, died in Carson last week of pneumonia.

Hunters must bear in mind that it is now against the law to shoot or kill meadow larks.

And it is now said that Sharkey and Jeffries will meet at Carson City during the month of May.

San Francisco metal market: Silver, 61⅛c.; copper, 18c.; lead, $5; antimony, 100-lb. lots, 15@18.

Charles Collins came down from Black Canyon yesterday and is visiting his sister, Mrs. Bertrand Rhine.

A C. & C. special train, conveying Superintendent Laws and Mr. Mills, passed down to the end of the road yesterday.

A. A. Cashbaugh, an old-time and well respected citizen of Bishop, died near that place on Monday last, of blood poisoning. We have no particulars, but understand that death resulted from a barb-wire wound.

The Panamint Mining Company has incorporated. Principal place of business, Los Angeles. Directors: J. P. Flint, V. S. Jones, M. B. Jones, W. A. Harris of Los Angeles, and T. N. Stebbins of Ballarat. Capital stock $200,000, subscribed in full.

The bill providing for a right-of-way for the Salt Lake road, through the grounds of the Highland asylum, passed the assembly last Friday as an urgency measure and has gone to the governor. There is no doubt that the bill will receive his approval.

The Randsburg railroad is now using oil in their engines at a saving of nearly one-half over the old style. They have also erected an engine house 20x70 and 18 feet high, substantially built and covered with iron, for the housing of their engines at the Randsburg end of the line.

Several American metal mines are considerably below ocean level, notably in California and Michigan. The bottom of the deepest shaft of the Calumet & Hecla is nearly three-fourths of a mile below the level of the ocean. The bottom of the Kennedy mine, Cal., is nearly 1000 feet below sea level.

Mr. Van Camp, of Salt Lake City, who has been doing considerable work near Ballarat, has made an examination of the Anvil Springs district, and is reported as saying that he is well pleased with the looks of the mines. He is now in San Francisco, and it is his intention to soon erect a three-stamp mill on his mine. The district is situate away over the summit and on the eastern slope of the Telescope range, overlooking Death Valley.

The Entertainment.

Notwithstanding the inclement weather last Friday, the audience gathered at the Shakespearian reading proved what has always been believed, that the majority of the community is very ready to support any effort in the direction of literary progress. The work of the Club on this occasion showed marked improvement in the management of stage business. The lines were rendered with intelligence, and while in some instances not wholly free from the effect of declamation, showed a careful study of the characters presented.

The players were costumed with historical accuracy, and all together the performance was one the townspeople did well not to miss.

The Club will begin work at once upon a popular drama which will be brought out in a few weeks. We are informed that no play will be given that has not been seen by the stage manager as presented by some actor of repute, and all costumes, makeups and stage settings will be modeled as nearly as possible on that standard, thus insuring the players and the audience against many of the errors of interpretation that might otherwise occur.

Surprise Party.

A pleasant surprise party was given by Mrs. Leora B. Rhine last Saturday evening in honor of Miss Maggie Ramsey, it being her seventeenth birthday. The L. O. L. Club had met for their studies, when, at 7:30 o'clock Miss Maggie was sent to the parlor for a book; on opening the door she beh l the guests in the parlor. Her surprise was so great that she rushed from the room, but soon recovered and followed the L. O. L. Club into the parlor. Games of various kinds and music amused the guests until they were invited into the dining room where a bountiful repast was spread. Beautiful little souvenirs were given to each one present. At 11:30 o'clock the pleasant party departed wishing Maggie many happy returns of the day.

Those present were: Mrs. Hession, Mr. Squires, Bert Rhine, Mrs. L.B. Rhine, Misses Maggie Ramsey, Irma Webb, Mamie Hession, Lou Ella Robinson, Amy Lawrence; Messrs. Frank Willis, Howard Mairs, Milton Levy, Jesse Hession, Otto Bradshaw, Silas Reynolds, Andy Ramsey, James Hession.

Theo. H. Lowe, a mining man of Denver, made an examination of the Tonapah mines last week. At present he is not prepared to pass judgment on them, as not enough work has been done to determine their permanence. He pronounces it as fine a surface prospect as he has ever seen. Mr. Lowe is managing large mining interests in Churchill county. He will revisit Tonapah in about a month, and at the same time examine other property in this vicinity. He is hunting all kinds of mines, but prefers copper or lead.—Bulletin.

Johnson's proposed amendment to the State Constitution has passed the Assembly and is up to the Senate. It provides that no poll tax shall ever be levied upon the voters or persons entitled to become voters of this State. We believe that, if submitted, the intelligent country vote will defeat this proposition. The well-paid working man does not ask exemption except as to the unjust and infernal road poll tax.

Good reports continue to come in from the oil fields. New men are coming and going all the time. Surveying is going on, but it seems that McKnight had to go some ten or fifteen miles to find a government stake, to tie to. Some of the boys have sold their locations. We heard of two that sold their interest in two quarter sections for $50.—Randsburg Miner.

Carson wants the Nevada State Fair held in Ormsby county hereafter, and a bill authorizing the sale of the State fair grounds and other property in Reno has passed the Legislature.

Under Sheriff Willis, teacher, telegrapher, type-writer and photographer, is also a compositor, which latter fact happens to be very fortunate for the INDEPENDENT this week.

The Ladies' Aid Society of Big Pine are arranging for a fair and festival to be held March 22, for the benefit of the parsonage fund.

S. A. Frazer has purchased Alvah Bell's lease of the Matlack blacksmith shop, and is ready for all kinds of spring work.

J. E. Parker has gone to his home at Big Pine for general recuperation, expecting to return to newspaper work in a week or so.

FOR SALE.—Part of four lots—berries and fruit. House of four rooms with kitchen basement. Rooms ceiled and closets. Price, $550 cash, $600 on time. Also upright piano, Standard make, cheap. Furniture, etc.

With few exceptions the large and handsome structures in San Francisco, Denver and Salt Lake City are the result of profit in mining, and the bulk of the manufacturing and industrial enterprises in those three cities had their start from the same source.

EPIDEMIC OF GRIP WORST EVER KNOWN.

GRIP BACILLUS EVERYWHERE—IN THE AIR WE BREATHE. IN THE WATER WE DRINK, IN THE FOOD WE EAT.

Bacillus of Grip.

Magnified 16,000 times.

Hundreds of carloads of Peruna are shipped in all directions to meet the extraordinary demand of the grip epidemic.

Everybody laying in a stock of this valuable remedy in time to meet the terrible enemy, the Grip.

The extensive facilities of the manufacturers taxed to their utmost to meet the urgent demand for Peruna.

Almost everybody has the grip. Almost everybody must have Peruna.

Taken at the appearance of the first symptoms of the grip, not only is Peruna a prompt cure for the grip but it prevents those disastrous after effects so characteristic of this dread disease.

Peruna not only cures the grip but prevents it.

Taken in time thousands of lives will be saved in this present epidemic.

Every family should take the precaution to secure a supply of Peruna at once, for the retail and wholesale stock of the remedy may be exhausted by the enormous demand for it.

It is wisdom to have Peruna in the house even before the grip attacks the household.

It has been ascertained by a reporter that the following people of national reputation have given public endorsement and testimonials to Peruna as a remedy for la grippe:

Congressman Howard, of Alabama, says: "I have taken Peruna for the grip and recommend it as an excellent remedy to all fellow sufferers."

Congressman White, of North Carolina, says: "I find Peruna to be an excellent remedy for the grip. I have used it in my family and they all join me in recommending it."

Miss Francis M. Anderson, of Washington, D. C., daughter of Judge Anderson, of Virginia, says: "I was taken very ill with the grip. I took Peruna and was able to leave my bed in a week."

Mrs. Harriette A. S. Marsh, President of the Woman's Benevolent Association, of Chicago, writes: "I suffered with grip seven weeks. Nothing helped me. Tried Peruna and within three weeks I was fully restored. Shall never be without it again."

At the appearance of the first symptoms of grip people should stay indoors and take Peruna in small doses (teaspoonful every hour) until the symptoms disappear. This will prevent a long, disastrous sickness and perhaps fatal results.

One View of Our Women.

American women separate themselves more each year from the life of the country and affect to smile at any of their number who honestly wish to be of service to the nation. They, like the French aristocracy, are perfectly willing, even anxious, to fill agreeable diplomatic posts at first class foreign capitals, and are naively astonished when their offers of service are not accepted with gratitude by the authorities at Washington. But let a husband propose to his better half some humble position in the machinery of our government and see what the lady's answer will be. A New York woman was transplanted to a western city, where she was told that "the ladies of the place expected her to become their social leader." "I don't see anything to lead," was the amiable response.—From Eliot Gregory's "Worldly Ways."

No Family to Boast Of.

Miss Carolina—Is Mr. Burbank a man of family?

Miss Virginia—Not that anybody knows of.

Miss Carolina—Somebody told me that he is the father of several children.

Miss Virginia—Has a house full of them, but he can't trace their lineage beyond his common old grandfather.—Denver News.

Time It Was Killed.

Truthful Waiter (promptly)—Was killed this morning, sir.

Particular Diner (approvingly)—You did quite right to kill it, because it had been on shore so long that it must have forgotten how to swim, and would have been drowned if it had ever gone to sea again.

"An umbrella is a good deal like a fellow's hair," remarked the observer of events and things. "If you lose it, you seldom get it back again."

Simplicity In Funerals.

The simplicity which marked the ancient Jewish burial ceremonies has much to commend it even to us. The inexpensive coffin and the uniform linen shroud served to emphasize the equality of all in death. As things are today the rich tax their brains to invent new funeral fineries and the poor impoverish themselves to keep up with their wealthier neighbors. — Jewish American.

KEEP YOUR BLOOD CLEAN

The Englishman Caught On.

An Englishman on his first visit to this city with his family strolled down Broadway alone one night and dropped into a music hall. He had hardly been seated before two sketch artists perpetrated the following:

Persiflage—Hear about Jones? Terrible thing happened to Jones.

Badinage—No.

Persiflage—Yes. He dropped 350 feet.

Badinage—You don't tell me? Of course he was killed?

Persiflage—No, not killed. They were pigs' feet.

A half hour later the Briton grasped his sides and startled the house with an outburst of cachinatory ecstasy. Recovering, he jumped up, hurried out of the music hall and soon reached his hotel. He stopped outside the door of his room and gave way again to a soul stirring laugh. Entering the room he immediately called to his wife:

"Edith," he cried. "Oh, this is the jolliest ever!" and he gave way again.

His wife looked at him in frightened surprise.

"Oh, Edith, did you ever hear about Percy Smithers?"

"No."

"Bah Jove, the poor fellow fell 350 feet."

"How dreadfully horrid! He must have been awfully mangled."

"No. He fell on 350 pigs," and he exploded again and did not subside until a half dozen bell boys rushed to his room to make solicitous inquiries.—New York Sun.

How Water Causes a Fire.

One would hardly believe that a bottle of water standing harmlessly on a table could be the cause of a fire. Nevertheless such is the case. In my laboratory the other day I detected the odor of burning wood and, seeking the cause, noticed a tiny wreath of smoke rising from the counter. Setting aside a flask of water that stood close by I sponged over the burning spot with a damp cloth. Shortly after I again detected the odor of burning wood, when, to my surprise, I discovered another burning spot on the table close to the water flask. The flask was standing in the sunlight, thereby concentrating the rays to a focus on the top of the table, acting in this case as a burning glass. A handful of highly combustible material was thrown over the burning spot, catching fire almost immediately.

I cite this instance merely as a warning to chemists and apothecaries, who may not realize how easily a fire may be started in their storerooms by the sun shining through bottles, flasks and carboys of liquid, converting them for the time being into burning glasses of great power. I have in mind now the instance of a fire originating in a storeroom from this cause.—New York Times.

Jack's Account of It.

One of Uncle Sam's able seamen, who was in an "Owl" train that was wrecked, thus described his experience: "It was a little after two bells this morning and I was smoking my pipe in the 'Owl's' stern galley. The first thing I knew of any happening was when I was thrown violently from my seat. After the pitching and jumping had stopped, I crawled out and saw that the steering gear of the 'Owl' had been carried away, causing her to part amidships. The after end listed badly to starboard and went aground, throwing all hands in a heap to the listed side. No lives were lost, however, though all were badly shaken up and somewhat damaged. One unlucky passenger bunted the glass out of a porthole, cutting her head and face quite badly. After wigwagging the craft coming up behind to change her course, the forward end of our craft picked up the passengers and crew and continued her voyage. As for me, I will be glad when I am safe aboard the Albatross again. This cruising overland is too rough and choppy for me."—Argonaut.

Begulling Childhood.

When my little son could scarcely walk, says Rev. C. T. Brady, a western missionary, I took him to the cathedral one day, when I returned for something I had forgotten after morning service.

I left the child in the nave, and when I went back to him he had advanced half way up the middle aisle and was standing where the sun threw a golden light about his curly head. A tiny object he was in that great church.

It was very still. He was looking about in every direction in the most curious and eager way. To my fancy he seemed like a little angel when he said in his sweet, childish treble, which echoed and re-echoed beneath the vaulted roof:

"Papa, where's Jesus? Where's Jesus?"

He had been told that the church was the house of the Saviour, and on this, his first, visit he expected to see his Lord.

That baby is quite grown up now. Not in the faintest particular does he resemble an angel. The other day, when I rode off to the wars, he astonished even me with this request:

"Papa, if you get wounded, don't forget to bring me the bullet that knocks you out. I want it for a souvenir for my collection."

Fortunately for me, if unfortunately for him, I brought him no bullet.

Raising the Fee.

In that particular year it happened that the national political convention of which we are speaking was held in some other town than Chicago, and the place was crowded.

This is how it came to pass that Colonel Hankthunder, who went merely as a prominent citizen of the republic and had not taken the precaution to engage a room beforehand, found himself shut out of the hotels and compelled to choose lodgings from a list of eligible private dwellings.

The woman of the house near the corner of Fish street and Potato avenue, the first residence at which he called, showed him the only room she had to spare.

"That suits me, ma'am," he said. "How much will it cost me for board and lodging here for the next four days?"

"Well," she answered, "this is not a regular boarding house, and I am only taking boarders because I want to educate my boy for a lawyer. I shall have to charge you $6 for the four days."

"Madam," loftily rejoined the colonel, taking out his pocketbook, "you will never educate your boy for a lawyer by giving such an example as that. I will pay you $10."—Chicago Tribune.

The Power of the Press

Is a common expression, but few realize its actual power. Great as is the influence of the press, it cannot begin to equal the power of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters over disease. The Bitters strengthens the stomach, purifies the blood, and cures dyspepsia, indigestion and constipation. It will tone up the nerves, stimulate inactive kidneys, and as an appetizer, it is unequaled. If you want to get well, and keep well, use Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.

GOLD HOARDED BY MISERS.

Millions of Yellow Coin Disappear Annually from Circulation.

The world is full of millions and millions of long-lost sovereigns. A competent authority has just completed some investigations which, he declares, show that in three years the Bank of England has lost trace of no fewer than 20,000,000 golden coins of the realm. This wholesale disappearance of the elusive sovereign has been going on for years. A river of gold has flowed unceasingly from Threadneedle street to all parts of the world, but it has come back only as a tiny yellow streamlet. What has become of the surplus in its wanderings? "Misers" is the unpoetical explanation for a great part of this disappearance. There still exist in this and other countries people who are unbusiness-like enough to hoard up gold and keep it lying idle by them for the sole pleasure of knowing it is there and occasionally counting it.

The people of India appear to be particularly addicted to a habit that is more reminiscent of medieval times than of an age when money is generally saved so that more can be made with it. In the regency of Bombay it is estimated that 12,000,000 golden sovereigns are hoarded. If that is the record of Bombay alone, what is the full tale for the whole country? China, too, absorbs a vast amount of gold that never sees the light again. As a matter of fact, while the whole world is searching for and trying to acquire gold, a goodly part of it appears to be engaged in the less thrilling pastime of hiding it away.

Great Britain is not guiltless of this commercial sin. Dotted all over the kingdom are graveyards of gold which, if discovered and opened, might restore to circulation a vast amount of wealth at present absolutely useless. At a spot about two miles from Herefordshire Beacon a treasure chest is recorded in the local history as having been buried by a great family once resident in the district. But the money cannot be found. There is a similar record in connection with Hulme Castle, formerly a seat of a branch of the Prestwich family. Somewhere near Stokesey Castle, Shropshire, there is believed to be hidden a great oaken chest filled with gold coins, but up to the present al efforts to find it have ended in failure.—London Daily Mail.

THE UNSPEAKABLE TURK.

He Scorns All Effort but Military Service and Agriculture.

A Turk thinks it the most natural thing in the world to lose a province, and, having lost it, to quit and live elsewhere. He talks quite complacently of leaving Constantinople some day; he will go over to Asia and found another capital. He originates nothing; he takes what he finds without assimilating it, and remains profoundly Turkish. He leaves no trace of his occupation except ruins. Practically there is nothing at Belgrade, Sofia, and Athens to show that for centuries they were Turkish cities.

All occupations, except agriculture and military service, are distasteful to him. Yet there are two other characteristics even more important than these. The first is his sense of discipline. It is this which keeps together the apparently tottering fabric of the Turkish empire. It makes the half-fed, half-clother soldier ready to endure every privation, and prevents the corruption and incapacity of the officers from producing the anarchy which would be inevitable in any other country. Sedition is unknown; even complaints are rare, and were a holy war proclaimed there is not a man who would not be prepared to die in defense of the system of extortion which grinds him down.

His second characteristic is his laziness, in spite of the laborious industry of the Turkish peasant. The fact is that the Turk is too proud to do many things, too stupid to do others. His religion inculcates a fatalism which tends to a conviction that effort is useless.—London Telegraph.

Election Practices in India.

Revelations made recently regarding Bombay municipal elections show that Hindoo election agents can excel the wildest achievements in Europe or America. It is discovered to be a common practice to dress up lads to impersonate female ratepayers who are either dead or are reluctant to vote. In many other cases women are hired to represent such voters. Personation by men of male voters who are dead or traveling is too common to excite remark. The most amazing discovery is that there is now a class of men who call themselves "professional vote-brokers" and openly undertake to secure votes at a fixed price a head.—Bombay letter.

A woman says there is no pleasure in suffering if it must be done in silence.

WOMAN'S DUTY.

In Justice to Herself, Her Husband and Her Children, Her Health Should Be Her First Consideration.

Thousands of women endure the tortures of living death and at last succumb to the diseases peculiar to their sex without knowing of the life and health which might be theirs if proper treatment had been used. How pathetic is the story of thousands of young mothers who every year are carried to their graves leaving little children to struggle alone in the world without the tender care and wise counsel of a mother. And how deplorable when it is known that there is a remedy so exactly suited to the needs of suffering women that it cures the most stubborn of their diseases.

Immediately after the birth of her first child in 1896, Mrs. Grace Campbell, of No. 391 Logan street, Grand Rapids, Mich., now 28 years of age, was afflicted with a complication of diseases. Her story, as told in her own words, follows:

"The birth of my first child left me in a deplorable condition. My system was broken down and I suffered from general debility. I was exceedingly nervous and rheumatism also troubled me. My appetite failed and the most delicate and inviting food failed to tempt me. I was thin and pale, and had neither energy nor ambition. My case had been growing steadily worse for two years. I had used several so-called remedies but found no curative qualities in them.

"In the summer of 1898, I was visiting my grandmother in Ludington, Mich., and there learned of the wonderful cures effected by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I tried the pills and had not finished one box before I felt much better. I continued taking them through the year and the result was a perfect cure. I am no longer nervous or rheumatic and have more than regained my lost flesh. I certainly recommend the pills to all who need them and their results have always been beneficial."

Bogged.

While traveling in Cornwall in 1891 Rev. S. Baring-Gould came near being overwhelmed in a bog. He and his companions got lost and at dusk found themselves in a bog called Redmire. Six bullocks had already been lost there that year. Mr. Baring-Gould's adventure is related in his "Book of the West."

"All at once I sank above my waist and was being sucked farther down. I cried to my companion, but in the darkness he could not see me, and had he seen me he could have done nothing for me. The water finally reached my armpits.

"Happily I had a stout bamboo some six feet long, and I placed this athwart the surface and held it with my arms as far expanded as possible. By jerks I succeeded in gradually lifting myself and throwing my body forward till finally I was able to cast myself at full length on the surface. The suction had been so great as to tear my leather gaiters off my legs.

"I lay at full length gasping for nearly a quarter of an hour before I had breath and strength to advance, and then wormed myself along on my breast till I reached dry land. My companion, it turned out, had had a similar experience."

Breaking the News Gently.

There is a man in Liverpool who is renowned for his imperturbable calmness on every imaginable occasion. One day he strolled leisurely into the office of a friend.

"I have just had a chat with your wife," he said by way of beginning.

"Why, I didn't know she was in town."

"Oh, she wasn't in town," replied the other. "I called at your house."

"I didn't know she was receiving today," said the husband with some surprise. "I thought she had a headache."

"She didn't mention it to me," said the calm man. "There was a crowd at the house."

"A crowd!" echoed the husband.

"Yes," went on the calm man. "They came with the fire engine."

"The fire engine!" gasped the husband.

"Oh, it's all right," went on the calm man. "It's all out now. It wasn't much of a fire, but I thought you'd like to know it."—London Tit-Bits.

THE HAPPIEST HEART.

Who drives the horses of the sun
Shall lord it but a day;
Better the lowly deed were done,
And kept the humble way.

The rust will find the sword of fame,
The dust will hide the crown;
Ay, none shall nail so high his name
Time will not tear it down.

The happiest heart that ever beat
Was in some quiet breast
That found the common daylight sweet,
And left to heaven the rest.
—John Vance Cheney.

Aye the Same.

THEY were two happy ghost lovers, and they had slipped down to earth again to see how it fared with earth-bound lovers now.

"Does it not seem strange, dearest," asked the girl ghost softly, as they floated along, hand in hand, just above the busy, material city of Chicago, "that we were once bound to this narrow earth, and had to depend upon mere words for exchanging thoughts and opinions?"

"Do you remember, my darling," was the counter-question of the man ghost, "how we once quarreled and were estranged and unhappy for many months because we depended upon mere words for communication and misunderstood the meaning of the tricky things?"

"Poor children! How sily we were, and yet how helpless," sighed the girl ghost, pityingly; "things are easier for us in the Land of Shades."

"I wonder do other mere earth lovers have the same troubles now?" she mused, a little later.

"Yes, dearest, always," was the man ghost's smiling answer. "We may be sure of it. Love's ways are aye the same."

"If we find any of them in trouble

"ONCE I ACTED AS YOU ARE DOING."

let us help them," said the girl ghost, eagerly. "I could be unhappy and sorrowful now—if I had not forgotten how—to think of what and how we suffered during that terrible estrangement. Dearest! What should we have done, how should we have borne it, had not some one helped us to understand each other? I could not have waited until we—came up here!"

"There was no need," said the man ghost, tenderly, "our love was too strong to let us stay apart."

And for a moment the shadowy lips and arms met and were mingled, just as though the earth still bound them, while the shadowy hearts beat near together. For love's ways are aye the same—for ghosts and humans.

They were floating over a pretty suburb—the suburb where she had lived, and where they had made love together. On the same veranda where this had happened—ah, how long ago!—other lovers—earth lovers—were sitting, silently and a little apart. The ghost lovers read the unuttered thoughts which kept the girl's eyes stern and yet tearful and the man's lips tense.

"If he really loved me he would see that I am not cross, but only troubled, and he would comfort me with loving words and caresses."

So ran the troubled meditation of the girl.

"If she really loved me she would see that I am worried to death over business matters, and that I need just a little soothing and comforting myself."

So the man was thinking, moodily.

"I think I will say good-night," he said aloud, a moment later, and his voice was cold as the heart of winter.

"Must you go so early?" and her voice was just as cold.

He rose immediately and had gone half way down the steps, without uttering any farther farewell, before the ghost lovers fully realized all that was happening. Wrapped in the varied recollections called up by the little scene and the surroundings they were standing, motionless but hand in hand, still, just behind the earth couple, thinking, thinking. Now they started forward, simultaneously, and whispered in the ears of the unhappy, misguided earth lovers.

"Once, a long time ago, I acted as you are doing, and my heart nearly broke in consequence."

Thus the ghost man to his earth brother.

"Once, a long time ago, I let my lover go lightly, as you are doing, and I was sad for many months."

This from the ghost girl to her earth sister.

"Think! What if you should never come together, really, truly, in heart and soul, again!"

So whispered both ghosts, earnestly.

The earth lovers turned suddenly and gazed upon each other.

"Dear heart! What is the matter with us both this evening!" they cried, aloud.

Next moment both had taken a step toward the other. Another instant and their hands were clasped, the ghost lovers gently lifting and pushing the half-reluctant fingers into place. When the girl's head went down on the man's shoulder and the man's arm went tenderly around the girl's waist, the ghost lovers looked at each other and smiled happily. For love's ways are aye the same, in all times and places.

"Kiss her, kiss her!" murmured the man ghost to the masculine earth lover.

"Say something kind and loving," whispered the girl ghost to the other maiden.

Then, when their soft commands had been obeyed, all unknowingly, and all was well between the earth lovers, they joined hands once more and floated off sweetly, their shadowy hearts beating close together.

"They are happy," said the girl ghost, half wistfully, as they soared upward.

"So are we," said the man ghost, softly, and they drew even more closely together.

Then they looked back and the lovers were embracing.

"Love's ways are aye the same," said both ghosts, smiling.

ONE OF THE CUDAHY LETTERS.

The original letter, telling Mr. Cudahy where to "deposit" the $25,000 in gold to insure the return of his son, was written in the same style as the one here shown. This fac simile of the writing is identical in all the letters thus far received by Mr. Cudahy from the supposed kidnapers, and, strange to say, these letters were all mailed in Omaha except the first, which was left on the lawn in front of the millionaire's residence.

A letter printed with a lead pencil was received by Mr. Cudahy last week, demanding the withdrawal of the offer of a reward for the kidnapers. The fact that the address was printed in similar style to the other ones gave rise to the suspicion before it was opened that it was from the same source, but Mr. Cudahy pronounced it an imitation, and did not attach the slightest significance to it. It was mailed in the Omaha postoffice.

WARNING when it is to late

The letter demanded withdrawal of the Cudahy offer of reward and of the city's offer as well under penalty not only of trouble for the children, but the destruction of the entire "Cudahy family." The epistle closed with an injunction to "head this warning."

WIDOW LOVED THE BANDMASTER

Wedding Notes that Will Buy More than Those of a Cornet's Silver Throat.

No more will Thomas C. Bent, who was wont to play in Gilmore's band, be compelled to blow notes from the silver throat of a cornet. The new Mrs. Bent will supply all the notes necessary in the family, for it is said Mr. Bent's marriage portion is $15,000 a year. A good many men could love for less than that. Six years ago Bent, who was leader of the Old Guard band, eloped with Isabelle Nixon, the daughter of a Presbyterian clergyman of note. Seven months ago she died. Then he met Mrs. Albert Wyckoff, a widow of a year, and worth several million dollars. She is 50 years old, and a score of years his senior, but they loved and were married at the Waldorf-Astoria, in New York, and have gone abroad for the winter. Before they left the groom declared: "I ought to have waited a year before marrying, but Mrs. Wyckoff couldn't arrange to get away then."

NEW LOCOMOTIVE.

Electric Engine Expected to Run 120 Miles an Hour.

The development of electrotechnics, particularly that part dealing with the application of electricity as motive power for railroad trains, has made remarkable progress in Germany recently. In April a series of tests with electrical locomotives was begun on the branch line between Gesundbrunnen and Lagerhof, Prussia, which have proved so successful that they promise a complete revolution in the transportation system of Germany and of the world in general. That line was chosen because it offered the greatest number of difficulties in the form of curves, crossings, and steep grades. An alternating current of 12,000 volts is supplied by overhead wires and is reduced to one-twelfth of its tension by the commutator placed upon the locomotive. Water power is used to generate the required electricity. The greatest practical speed of steam locomotives is about sixty miles an hour, while with the new electrical locomotive, it is expected to reach a velocity of 120 miles. The cost of running a locomotive with steam power is estimated at $7 a day, while the cost of running one of the new electrical railroad motors is only $4.25 a day. Similar experiments have been made on other lines in Germany and in Italy.

ELECTRIC LOCOMOTIVE.

Washington Relics.

One of the most interesting relics in the National Museum at Washington is the camp chest used by Washington throughout the revolution. It is a compact affair about the size of a tourist's wicker chest for cooking of the present day, two and one-half feet long, two feet wide, one foot high, and it contains an outfit consisting of tinder box, pepper and salt boxes, bottles, knives, forks, girdiron and plates. Every bit of the outfit save one bottle, which is broken at the shoulder, looks strong enough to stand another campaign.

Nearby are the tents used by Washington, three in number. One is a sleeping tent, twenty-eight feet long, with walls six feet high and a roof with a six-foot pitch. It is made of linen. The other two are Marquee tents of smaller size, one with walls, the other a shelter tent, open on the sides. That the tenting material of revolutionary days was good stuff is proved by the excellent condition of these tents, which sheltered the great commander through all his severe campaigns.

Here also is Washington's uniform, worn by him when he gave up his commission as commander-in-chief of the army, at Annapolis, in 1783. It consists of a big shad-belly coat of blue broadcloth, lined and trimmed with soft buckskin and ornamented with broad, flat brass buttons; buckskin waistcoat and breeches. The size of the garments (which are in a state of excellent preservation) testify to the big stature of the "Father of His Country" and suggest that he had an eye to a fine appearance in his dress.—Washington Post.

Long Necks.

One of Philadelphia's most distinguished portrait painters asserts that the necks of American women are becoming longer and more slender year by year. The high collar, he declares, is responsible for it. All the life studies and portraits of women seen at students' exhibits demonstrate this. "I know a man," he said the other day, "who took a tape measure to the last exhibit at the academy of fine arts and succeeded in getting data for a comparison of women's necks painted ten years ago, five years ago and at the present time. He claims that the average feminine neck has become elongated to the extent of nearly an inch during the last five years.

The Useful Atheist.

James Balfour, member of the legislative council of Victoria, is said to be a man without a single redeeming vice. When a discussion arose in Melbourne about the iniquity of cooking dinners on the Sabbath he publicly announced that, though he had hot potatoes for the principal meal on that day, they were cooked by an atheist who lived next door.—Sydney Bulletin.

Two white women of Nashville, Tenn., have sold their bodies to a local physician for $2 each, and a contract to that effect has been put on record at the registrar's office.

According to advices from London Japan has invited tenders for the establishment of an armor plate factory at Tokio, which, it is thought, means that in the future Japan intends to construct her own war vessels.

Though storm and flood did their terribly destructive work in Galveston, Tex., only such a little while ago, the undaunted citizens of the stricken town have done much toward restoring it to its former good condition.

Recently an institution was opened in Belgium for the alleged cure of tuberculosis by the exclusive raw meat diet. After a trial of a few months the experiment was abandoned, as it was found that there was no efficacy in the cure.

Several members of a church in Kutztown, Pa., having fallen far behind with their fair dues, the board of trustees has decided that in future the bell shall not be tolled for a funeral in any family which has not paid up its indebtedness and a year in advance besides.

Indians on the Rosebud reservation in South Dakota are expressing regret that they agreed to allow herds of cattle on their lands. They gave permission at first because pasture on the regular ranges was worn out and 25,000 cattle were soon grazing on Indian lands.

A company at Ansonia, Conn., has just received the largest order for copper trolley wire ever placed in this country. The weight is more than 1,000,000 pounds and the destination is British India, where the wire will be used to equip one of the first trolley lines in that colony.

According to recent legislation in New York State a man is required to support his mother-in-law. Another legal arrangement provides that a woman need not support her husband unless he is incapable of labor or unless an agreement for mutual support has been made previous to marriage.

Every ship loading at New Orleans with mules or horses under British contracts for use in South Africa is being carefully watched to prevent the placing on board of infernal machines or other destructive instruments in behalf of the Boers' cause. The coal especially is subjected to careful scrutiny.

A public school principal in New Orleans says that the ability to decipher more or less obscure handwriting quickly and accurately is, in his opinion, one of the best possible tests of general intelligence. He uses it quite frequently in his school, without letting the pupil suspect what he is after.

German capitalists have planned the construction of a railroad through the Samoyede peninsula with the object of bringing the wheat of western Siberia quickly and economically into the world market. The wheat will be shipped by the Ob and its navigable tributaries to Obdorsk; then by rail to the seacoast, and thence by vessel to London or other ports.

A new bridge is about to be built across the Bosporus, bearing the name of the Sultan, Abdul-Hamid. It will be constructed of granite and metal by the Bosporus Railway Company, which designs a junction between the railways of Europe and the transatlantic railway of Bagdad, now being built by the Germans. The narrowest dividing line of sea has been chosen for the point of construction.

The use of oysters has often been discouraged on the ground that they were under certain conditions dangerous mediums of conveying disease, especially germs of typhoid fever. Now the physicians are said to have forbidden another relish nearly as popular at this time of the year. Celery has come under the ban of the doctors, who say that it is equally well adapted to transmitting the poisonous element of the soil and carrying the germs of typhoid.

Astronomers are discussing the theory that the moon is in its glacial epoch. One telescopic expert calls the "craters" ice cups and the streams along their sides glacial weather. Another insists that the signs of volcanic action are unmistakable. All agree that most of the moon's surface is intensely white. The dark regions are termed seas, but there is no evidence that they contain water. Some writers believe they are covered with the earliest forms of vegetation.

An influential English Jewish peeress, member of the board of direction of the female convict prisons, was distressed at the lack of provision of devotional literature for Jewish prisoners and undertook to bring about a correction, with the result that the home secretary authorized special devotional literature for Jewish convicts. A popular work was selected and a large stock secured. When the distribution commenced the most careful search only produced one Jewess in British prisons.

A recent illustration of the passion for litigation is furnished by a citizen of New York, who was a guest at one of the Mills hotels there, and whose undershirt was lost in the wash. What was deemed compensation for the lost garment was offered him, but he preferred to carry the case to the courts, where he sued Mr. Mills to recover 75 cents. He was nonsuited, and then he carried the case up to the higher courts, and now the appellate term of the Supreme Court has affirmed the judgment of the lower court. It has cost the litigious plaintiff the price of several dozen undershirts.

DEPARTMENT STORE IDYL.

Sudden Decrease in the Price Asked for a Velvet Cape.

"It did me good just to see them," the stout saleswoman said to the fitter, as the two met at the drawer where they were putting away things.

"See who?" the fitter replied, in her best English.

"That couple that went out of here just now. You must have noticed—a big, awkward countryman and a girl rigged out in cheap feathers and red ribbon. Had a satchel with them."

"Believe I did see them," said the fitter. "A bridal pair?"

"Going to be. About the first of the month, I think. He is helping pick out the bridal outfit. The girl wanted a velvet shoulder cape, but she couldn't go over $9. She wanted jet trimming, lace and all that. She tried on the cheapest one we have—that $11 lot—and was delighted with it. The groom liked it, too. He told her she looked like a peach in it, and praised her up so that she turned all colors. He even asked my opinion as to how it looked. However, she pulled it off at once when she heard the price, but her face fell and she looked nearly ready to cry when she said that after all perhaps a coat at $9 would be more useful than the cape."

"Well, so it would be more useful," said the fitter, putting her pins in line and equal distance from the armhole of a garment she was to alter. "Did she get a coat?"

"No; she's got the cape, and I'm as much pleased about it as she is. That fellow she is to marry is a hulking clown, but he has a heart and as much delicacy as a duke. When the girl took the cape off and looked so disappointed he motioned to me behind her back, holding out a $2 bill, and then said out loud: 'Here, miss, is that the lowest you can take for that garment? She's bought two dresses and some shoes and handkerchiefs downstairs, and it seems to me you ought to make her a better figure than that. The cape ain't worth a cent over $9.'

"I pretended to consider a little, and walked away, as though to consult somebody. Then, while the girl was examining the cape for the fifth or sixth time and I was behind a screen hanging up some cloaks, he came and gave me the extra $2. 'Don't let her know,' he whispered. 'She'd never take it if she thought I helped to pay for it. But it's her wedding cape, and I want her satisfied.' Then I told the girl that it was the last cape we had of that special kind, so I would let it go for $9. And you ought to have seen her face when I told her! She just lit up all over like a sunburst, and went off wearing the cape, as proud as though it was silk velvet instead of velour, and was lined with real silk instead of flimsy satin. They have gone down to the restaurant now to get lunch. I doubt if the young fellow has much money, but he's as tender of his sweetheart as if she was made of crystal and likely to fall to pieces in his hands any minute."—New York Evening Post.

Great Powers of Flight.

The rooks pass over the island of Heligoland, in interminable flocks, every autumn, on their way to their winter quarters. According to the observations noted, their flight was directed precisely from the east to the west; the first birds appeared about 8 a. m., and the line kept passing until about 2 p. m. The arrival at the English coast was noted; the first birds reached there at 11 a. m. and the last at 5 p. m. The rooks then traversed the eighty geographical miles between Heligoland and England in three hours, which corresponds to a speed of fifty-five meters (180 feet) a second. The observation made on the so-called "redtails" is still more interesting. These birds, which live in Norway and Finland, pass the winter on the banks of the Nile, in the Indies, etc. At the time of their return to the north they are captured by hundreds in Heligoland. Now it is known that they fly only during the night, and that they are almost unknown in Greece, Italy or Germany. It seems then that they make a single trip of it—and in a single night—from their winter home. The trip from Egypt to Heligoland (more than 400 geographical miles) is then accomplished in one spring night; that is, in barely nine hours, which corresponds to a speed of ninety-two meters (302 feet) a second. It is well known that carrier pigeons rarely exceed thirty meters (ninety-eight feet) a second.—Die Natur.

Scaring Away Crows.

Artificial scarecrows are of little if any value in Egypt. The owners of the cornfields near the Nile have to employ natives, who stand on raised platforms and throw stones to scare away the voracious birds, which would otherwise quickly devour the entire crop.

When you sell an article by weight, remember that other people have scales.

How to Bandage.

Fig. 1 represents the mode of applying what is called a many tailed bandage—useful to apply over a wound, or wherever it requires frequent changing, or in cases in which it is desirable not to exhaust the patient by much movement of the limb. This is a strip of cotton somewhat longer than the limb to be enveloped; on it are sewn, at right angles, other strips, about one-half longer than the circumference of the limb, each overlapping the other about one-third of its breadth, so that when drawn tightly over in regular succession, each secures the other. The end of the strip passes under the heel, and coming up on the other side, is made fast to the bandage there, and so all is kept firm.

The bandage used to close a vein after bleeding is made thus: Lay the tape obliquely across the wound, pass it around the arm above the elbow, and bring it back again over the same spot; then let go round the arm below the elbow, and returning, let the two ends be tied in a secure bow, in the bend of the arm, with the free movement of which the bandage should not be tight enough to interfere, although it must be sufficient to retain its position. This mode of bandaging is called the figure of 8, from its resemblance to that figure.

For a sprained ankle, place the end of the bandage upon the instep, then carry it round and bring it over the same part again, and from thence round the foot two or three times, finishing off with a turn or two round the leg above the ankle.

For a sprained wrist, begin by passing the bandage round the hand, across and across, like the figure 8; exclude the thumb, and finish with a turn or two round the wrist.

For a cut finger, pass the bandage (a narrow one), round the finger several times, winding from the top, and splitting the end; fasten by tying round the thick part above the cut; or, if it be high up, tie round the wrist.

The best bandage for the eyes is an old silk handkerchief passed over the forehead, and tied at the back of the head. For the head itself, it is best to have a cross bandage, or rather two bandages—one passing across the forehead, and round the back of the head, and the other over the top of the head, and below the chin. Or, better than this is, perhaps, a large handkerchief, which will extend all over the forehead and crown, two ends of it passing to the back, and after crossing from thence round the neck, then tying the other two beneath the chin.

For a bandage to support a pad of poultice under the arm-pit, a handkerchief may be used, put on as in Fig. 2; or a broad piece of cotton arranged in the same way. For fracture of the ribs, bandages should be about nine inches wide, and drawn round the body very tightly. In this case, as in that of any other fracture or dislocation, only a properly qualified person should attempt this application.

GIANT STONE THAT ROCKS.

Argentine Has the Greatest Phenomenon in the Known World.

One of the great natural wonders of the world is the rocking stone of Tandil, in the Argentine republic. It is located about 250 miles south of Buenos Ayres. The rocking stone, which has made the little town famous throughout Argentina, is the largest phenomenon of its kind in the world. The giant mushroom-shaped quartz bowlder stands upon the summit of some picturesque hills 1,000 feet in height, three miles from the outskirts of Tandil. It weighs over 700 tons, and is so nicely poised that it rocks in the wind and may be made by the strength of one man to crack a walnut. Yet this bowlder is so firm that, it is said, one of the old dictators, Rosas by name, once harnessed a thousand horses to it and was unable to dislodge it.

GREAT ROCKING STONE.

There are, of course, many such rocking stones scattered about the world, though there are none nearly so large. In New York State there are two, one near the town of Monticello of about forty tons, and the other in Salem, of over 80 tons. The former is nearly as round as an orange, and so nicely balanced upon a table of stone that a child, by pushing against either side, can rock it back and forth.

WHY HE PAINTS HIS FACE.

Reasons for a Custom Prevalent Among the Indians.

Every paint mark on the Indian's face is a sign with a definite meaning which other Indians may read. When an Indian puts on his full war paint he decks himself not only with his own individual honors and distinctions won by his own bravery, but also with the special honors of his family or tribe. He may possess one mark of distinction only or many; in fact, he may be so well off in this respect that, like some English noblemen, he is able to don a new distinction for every occasion. Sometimes he will wear all his honors at one time.

Among the Indian tribes is one designated by the symbol of the dogfish, painted in red on the face. The various parts of the fish are scattered heterogeneously on the surface of the face; the peculiarly long snout is painted on the forehead, the gills are represented by two curved lines below the eyes, while the tail is shown as cut in two and hanging from either nostril. When only one or two parts of an animal are painted on a man's face it is an indication of inferiority; when the whole animal appears, even though in many oddly assorted parts, the sign is one of great value and indicates a high rank.

Very popular are some of the honorable symbols painted on the Indians' faces. There are fish, flesh and fowl of all kinds—dog-salmon, devilfish, starfish, woodpeckers, eagles, ravens, wolves, bears, sealions and sea monsters, mosquitoes, frogs, mountain goats, and all manner of foot, claw or beak marks—each with a special meaning of its own.—Pearson's Magazine.

The Temples of Siva.

The shape of the temples of Siva, the Destroyer, does not differ from those of the other Indian gods. The chief entrance into the great temple, says a writer in the Architect, is by a high massive pyramid, the top of which has generally the form of a crescent; it invariably faces the east. Beyond the gate there is a large court, at the farther extremity of which another gate leads through a pyramid of less hight, but of the same form. A small yard separates it from the temple of the idol. In the middle of it there is either a huge bull or a linga carved in stone, raised on a huge pedestal, or put under a canopy supported by four pillars. This is the first object of adoration to the visitors, who then pass through a low, narrow door into the inside of the temple. This door is the only passage for light and air, there being no windows. A lamp which burns night and day gives a tolerable light. The interior of the building is generally divided into two parts, sometimes into three, the first of which is the most spacious and is destined to receive the people; the second, or the adytum, in which the idol resides, is much smaller and darker, and generally shut, the door being opened by the officiating priest, who, with some of his attendants, has alone the right of entering this mysterious place for the purpose of washing the image and dressing and bringing offerings to it. This part is often built in the shape of a vault, but it is so low as to make a prolonged stay in it rather oppressive.

Polite Servility in England.

The American finds the agreeable politeness of the English serving class in general very pleasant. One who is accustomed to the manners of American salesgirls and waitresses must be struck by the almost universal use of the words "Thank you" by English girls engaged in these occupations, says the New York Home Journal. An order in a restaurant or shop is invariably received with a pleasant "Thank you," uttered with such an agreeable intonation that one is inclined to evoke a repetition by another purchase or order. The girls in American stores, who apparently find industrial life so hard, and who carry with them a wearied air of conferring an undeserved favor when they wait on a customer, might find the wheels of life to run much easier if they would but use a little of the English oil of politeness. They would not really lose any of their "independence" in the process; for pleasant manners usually receive their recompense in reciprocity, and in a higher regard for the person who is dignified by them.

Easily Abated.

It takes the mosquito two and one-half hours to develop from its first stage to venomous maturity. The insect in all its phases may be instantly killed by contact with minute quantities of permanaganate of potash. It is claimed that one part of this substance is 1,500 of solution distributed in mosquito marshes will render the development of larvae impossible; that a handful of permanganate will oxidize a tenacre swamp, kill its embryo insects, keep it free from organic matter for thirty days at a cost of 25 cents; that, with care, a whole State may be kept free of insect pests at a small cost.

In some families of girls it seems to be agreed that certain ones shall work, while others play the lady.

Men and wagons rattle most when there is nothing in them.

INDEPENDENCE, CAL.,

FRIDAY, MARCH 22.....1901

The death of ex-President Benjamin Harrison removes from the fields of human activity a man whose noblest epitaph should be: "He was a thorough American." President Harrison was essentially a great man, because he was a great American. No local environment limited his Americanism. He was essentially a man of the whole country, a lover of the entire land, a man without sectional thought or interest; a statesman who placed his country before all other things political. He proved this by his services as a soldier, fighting gallantly through the war of the rebellion and rising from an inferior rank to be Brigadier General of Volunteers.

He was a lawyer of acumen, high accomplishment and profound learning. In Indiana he was recognized as one of the foremost of the few great leaders at the bar. He early took an active interest in politics, and impressed himself upon the people of his State as a masterly politician, clean, high minded, sagacious and honest to the core. He became a partisan Republican and battled for his party in a manner to command its admiration. He thus became its logical candidate when it went into the Middle West in search of Presidential timber, and he was elected triumphantly over the strongest and ablest candidate the Democracy could possibly summon to stand for the office.

As President he proved an executive of unfaltering courage and indomitable will. He was by no means austere, but no man approached him to use him, and succeeded. What he did was of his own motion and from his own conviction of what was right and truth. He was a good listener, assumed the judicial attitude with patience and rendered his decisions with celerity, precision and clearly expressed judgment. Not that he was not at times open to reply, or that he did not, being human and fallable, arrive at some erroneous constructions of the laws and the Constitution. But no man ever dared to charge him with insincerity, duplicity or lack of honest courage.

As President he did very much to lift America up before the nations of the world as a state demanding and entitled to fuller recognition in the family of nations, and he succeeded in inspiring both respect and fear in quarters where before we have been treated, to put it mildly, in a cavalier manner. A biographer has said of him that "when he was assigned to a duty he took the whole of the responsibility." He did not with vanity go to leadership, but once there he was the only leader. "No man in his Cabinet overshadowed him; he was President wholly, bravely, fearlessly and daringly indeed."

The manner in which he took hold of the issue between America and Chile revealed the man to the people in his true character more than had his previous career, brilliant as it had been. In the difficulty with England concerning the Behring Sea matter, his management was masterly, exoking from English statesmen enconiums of the highest order. That he failed of re-election is by no means attributed to any failure on his part to carry out the policy of his party or because of any mistakes he made as the nation's Chief Executive, nor because of non-recognition of his ability, nor because of any decline in his popularity. He was an able speaker, a profound reasoner as a law lecturer, an able advocate; a straightforward, courageous, patriotic, liberty loving and fearless American.—Weekly Union.

The senate killed the bill to abolish the poll tax. Several reasons were advanced for its action, the chief of which was the preposterous allegation that the people were in favor of maintaining the tax. The great majority of the citizens of California regard the poll tax as an imposition and an injustice.

In the devious course of legislation it was sought to amend the poll-tax law so as to abolish the 15 per cent perquisite of the tax collectors. This 15 per cent amounted to many thousands of dollars annually, and swelled the salary of the tax collector out of all proportion to the value of his services. The very fact that such a large commission was given for the collection indicated its injustice and unpopularity. The law makes corporations the agent of the tax collector in gathering in the poll tax, and cases have been known where the money has been taken from the wages of employes without asking their permission and regardless whether the citizen was a property owner and a responsible person or not. It is not quite clear at this writing whether the 15 per cent commission was abolished. A collection agency would not charge much more for collecting bad debts.—L. A. Herald.

The Woodhouse Mystery Revived.

Parke Barnes, who arrived from Inyo county last week, informs the Bulletin that Fred. Merkle, section foreman of the C. & B., recently found the bones of a human arm near Queen station. An Indian known as Jack Magee, who saw the bones, appeared much excited and upon being questioned said that they had been brought to the place by a coyote. He said that about 13 years ago a white man was traveling in the vicinity in a buckboard, and that an Indian had killed him with a shot gun and buried the remains in a ravine about three miles south of Queen, after which the buckboard and its contents were burned. Mr. Merkle offered the Indian $5 if he would point out the grave, but after consultation with other Indians he refused to do so.

Messrs. Barnes and Merkle believe that the murdered man was I. N. Woodhouse, whose mysterious disappearance about 14 years ago caused a sensation. The remains of an old buckboard near the spot confirm the belief that it was Woodhouse who was murdered there.

A reward of $750 was offered by the State and $250 by the county for the apprehension and conviction of the murderer.

Woodhouse left Hawthorne for Bishop on the 8th of January, 1887, in a buckboard. The next day he was seen at Teel's Marsh. This was the last ever seen of him. He never reached Bishop, and a few days later his horse returned to Hawthorne.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

Mazurka Canyon.

Nearly everybody in Inyo county has seen or heard of Mazourka Canyon but few have any conception of the amount of development work which has been done on the deep placer mines in that locality. The Mazourka Mining & Water Co., have been working steadily for two years on their tunnel, eleven miles from Independence, and the distance now reached is something over 2400 feet. It has always seemed to be a certainty that a large amount of gold must have accumulated in the main channel of the canyon, as the small gulches in the vicinity have been the means of many a good stake to the dry washers. It remained with the Mazourka Mining & Water Co., to prove the fact that these deposits actually existed, and Mr. A. M. Squire, the Supt of the Company, is responsible for the statement—that a good deposit of gold has actually been found on a bar or bench from the main channel, where nothing but the lightest gold could have been deposited. This bar is at least 20 feet higher than bedrock in the main channel consequently the prospects for a big run are excellent. The success of the deep placers is therefore assured and Mazourka will soon take its place amongst the dividend paying mines of the State.

On Tuesday evening last a bevy of sweet Rebekahs, accompanied by their invited escorts, gave a genuine surprise to Mrs. Wrinkle, of Georges Creek, and Miss Dodge, of Arizona, who is visiting Mrs. Wrinkle. Both the ladies are members of the order of Rebekahs and the young ladies all went dressed en costume, decollette gowns in pink and green. Every one fortunate enough to be present pronounced it the most enjoyable event of the season, and declare Mrs. Wrinkle and Miss Dodge to be admirable hostesses. Music, charades, recitations, dancing, "spin the plate" and other sundry osculatory games in profusion in which our reporter thinks the old men and the lawyers present got more than their proportion of osculatory bliss. Our young friends, gentlemen especially, regret that Miss Dodge must so soon return to her Arizona home.

A subscription list has been circulated in town during the past week for the purpose of securing the necessary means to fix up and build a wagon road to Onion valley from Independence. Onion valley is about 12 miles west of Independence and one of the finest camping places in the Sierra Nevadas. It is only about 3 miles from the summit, and the lakes and streams in its vicinity afford excellent fishing. Years ago there was a wagon road built to the old town Kearsarge, 3 miles below the valley, but the storms and sliding rock have filled it up so that in places there is only a trail remaining. Enough money has already been subscribed to warrant the asking of bids to complete the work.

On St. Patrick's evening Miss Mamie Hession was the recipient of a pleasant surprise party given by the L. O. L. Club and other friends, in celebration of the anniversary of her birthday. The evening was devoted to music, recitations and games. Supper was served at 11 o'clock and was followed by singing. Miss Mamie is a general favorite in Independence and is one of our most popular young ladies. Her many friends wish her many happy returns of the day.

AGENTS WANTED in Independence for a first-class legitimate Oil Company, recently incorporated, and having valuable oil lands surrounded by producing wells, and adjoining R R Station. Our company is already boring and down over 400 feet with our first well. Expect soon to strike oil. $1.00 shares, non-assessable, offered for a short time at 25 cents. Liberal commission paid to agents. Call or address Electric Oil Company, 1008 Call Building, San Francisco, Cal.

A Missouri editor published an item which stated that "the man who was hugging the hired girl had better stop or his name will be published." In a few days about twenty-five citizens paid up their subscriptions and told the editor to pay no attention to foolish stories going around.—Ventura Democrat.

An exchange thinks that courting a girl is like starting a newspaper. It starts out weekly, then becomes a tri-weekly, then emerges into a daily, and if it has any enterprise and stick-to-itiveness about it, it comes out with an extra about once a year.

Story With a Moral.

Here is a new story of the man who is too stingy to take his home paper: A man who is too economical to subscribe for a paper sent his little boy to borrow the copy taken by his neighbor. In his haste the boy ran over a four dollar stand of bees, and in ten minutes looked like a warty squash. His cries reached his father, who ran to his assistance, and failing to notice a barbed wire fence ran into that breaking it down, cutting a handful of flesh from his anatomy and ruining a four dollar pair of pants. The old cow took advantage of the hole in the fence and got into the cornfield and killed herself eating green corn. Hearing the racket, the wife ran, upset a a five-gallon churn of rich cream into a basket of chickens, drowning the whole flock. In the hurry she dropped a seven-dollar set of false teeth. The baby, left alone, crawled through the spilled milk and into the parlor, ruining a brand new twenty-dollar carpet. During the excitement the oldest daughter ran away with the hired man, the dog broke up eleven setting hens and the calves got out and chewed the tails off four fine shirts.

How the Trusts were Formed.

This is the way a hardware man sizes up things: "The glue trust went through because the members stuck together. The leather trust put its whole sole into the matter and succeeded. The rubber men stretched a point and made an agreement. The wheel trust went spinning on to success. The yeast trust was followed by a rise in prices. The milk trust took the cream of the business. The screw men wormed their way together. The ice trust froze the outsiders. The gas trust inflated things to great proportions. The starch trust stiffened prices. The oyster trust proved to be no shell game. The elevator trust sent things up and down in a lively manner. The wringer trust put a squeezer on the little fellows. The saw trust ripped things open. The salt trust was far from fresh. The crockery trust smashed prices. The fertilizer trust caused a stir in the neighborhood. And the window glass trust let in the light on many dark things.—Ex.

A subscriber to the S. F. Bulletin from Independence has the following communication in its issue of March 10th:

Being a subscriber to your popular paper, I take the liberty of writing and calling your attention to the fact that Inyo county has an oil boom.

Your paper devotes considerable space to the oil industry of the State, and as we in Inyo county, although isolated, are in the State, we think we are in it for oit.

Fifty-six thousand acres of land have been located by parties from Bakersfield They are situated around Owens Lake, in this country, and twenty-five miles north and south of said lake.

What I state as to the number of acres located in this country can be verified by the records of the County Clerk's office at this place.

CAUGHT BY THE GRIP.

Released by Pe-ru-na---Congressman Howard's Recovery---Congressman Geo. H. White's Case.

La Grippe is epidemic catarrh.—It spares no class or nationality. The cultured and the ignorant, the aristocrat and the pauper. The masses and the classes are alike subject to la grippe. None are exempt—all are liable.

Have you the grip? Or, rather, has the grip got you? Grip is well named. The original French term, la grippe, has been shortened by the busy American to read "grip." Without intending to do so a new word has been coined that exactly describes the case. As if some hideous giant with awful grip had clutched us in its fatal clasp. Men, women, children, whole towns and cities are caught in the baneful grip of a terrible monster.

Pe-ru-na For Grip.

Mrs. Dr. C. D. Powell, President of Epworth League, also President of Loyal Temperance Legion, writes from Chehalis, Wash.:

"I have used several remedies in cases of severe colds and la grippe, but none I consider of more value than Peruna."—Mrs. Dr. C. D. Powell.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus.

After-Effects of La Grippe.

Miss Emma Jouris, President Golden Rod Sewing Circle, writes from 40 Burling street, Chicago, Ill., as follows:

"This spring I suffered severely from the after-effects of la grippe. As the doctors did not seem to help me I bought a bottle of Peruna."—Miss Emma Jouris.

Congressman Howard's Letter.

Fort Payne, Ala.

The Peruna Medicine Co., Columbus, Ohio:

Gentlemen—"I have taken Peruna now for two weeks and find I am very much relieved. I feel that my cure will be permanent. I have also taken it for la grippe and I take pleasure in recommending Peruna as an excellent remedy to all fellow sufferers."—M. W. Howard, Member of Congress.

La Grippe Leaves the System in a Deplorable Condition.

D. L. Wallace, a charter member of the International Barber's Union, writes from 15 Western avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

"Following a severe attack of la grippe I seemed to be affected badly all over.

"One of my customers who was greatly helped by Peruna advised me to try it, and I procured a bottle the same day. Now my head is clear, my nerves are steady, I enjoy food, and rest well. Peruna has been worth a dollar a dose to me."—L. D. Wallace.

Grip Causes Deafness.

Mrs. M. A. Sharick, chaplain G. A. R. Woman's Relief Corps, writes from Fremont, Wash.:

"When la grippe was the prevailing illness in this Western country I was laid up the whole winter, I partially lost my hearing, and had a very bad case of catarrh of the head and throat.

"I read of Peruna, tried it, and had my hearing restored and catarrh cured. I cannot speak too well of Peruna."—Mrs. M. A. Sharick.

La Grippe Cured in Its First Stage.

Lieutenant Clarice Hunt, of the Salt Lake City Barracks of the Salvation Army, writes from Ogden, Utah:

"Two months ago I was suffering with so severe a cold that I could hardly speak.

"Our captain advised me to try Peruna, and procured a bottle for me, and truly it worked wonders. Within two weeks I was entirely well."—Clarice Hunt.

Congressman White's Letter.

Tarboro, N. C.

Gentlemen—"I am more than satisfied with Peruna and find it to be an excellent remedy for the grip and catarrh. I have used it in my family and they all join me in recommending it as an excellent remedy."—Geo. H. White, Member of Congress.

Remained in Feeble Health After Cured of La Grippe.

Mrs. T. W. Collins, Treasurer Independent Order of Good Templars, of Everett, Wash., writes:

"After having a severe attack of la grippe I continued in a feeble condition, even after the doctor called me cured. My blood seemed poisoned. Peruna cured me."—Mrs. T. W. Collins.

HUMOR OF THE WEEK

STORIES TOLD BY FUNNY MEN OF THE PRESS.

Odd, Curious and Laughable Phases of Human Nature Graphically Portrayed by Eminent Word Artists of Our Own Day—A Budget of Fun.

Mr. Cripps—Can you induce the cook to have one of her friends come and take dinner with her to-night?

Mrs. Cripps—The idea! What for?

Mr. Cripps—I expect to bring Jones and Smith home with me, and I'd like to have a nice dinner for them.—Philadelphia Record.

In Theatric Parlance.

Amateur—What does it mean in theatric circles when they say the "ghost walks?"

Veteran Actor—It means that the rest of us don't have to.—Detroit Free Press.

Inherent Talent.

Deacon Shanghai—Dat boy certainly is full ob music, Mrs. Jackson.

Mrs. Jackson—Yes, Deacon; hit comes nachel toe dat chile; his pap war run ovah by one o' dem street planners.

Taking the Sting Out of It.

"Have I got a bright future?" anxiously inquired the sweet young graduate, who was chock-full of ambition.

"Well, it isn't as bright as it might be," answered the antique clairvoyant, who was taking a long look into it; "but," she added with a girlish titter, "perhaps the gas is turned down."—Puck.

Proved His Point.

"Opportunity comes once to every man."

"That's right; and any man is bound to become famous if he only lives long enough."

"Oh, I don't quite believe that."

"You don't? Suppose a man lives to be 150 years old; wouldn't that make him famous?"—Philadelphia Record.

Trying to Follow the Injunction.

"And now," continued his angry spouse, thoroughly aroused. "I am going to give you another piece of my mind—what are you doing?"

"I am turning the other ear," patiently responded Mr. Meeker.—Chicago Tribune.

The Mystery of Motive.

"Why," asked the young wife, naively, "do you always whistle when you get my millinery bills?"

"To raise the wind!" replied the man.—Detroit Journal.

In 'isputable.

Mamma—Oh, Ethel, you never saw me behave like that.

Ethel (aged 4)—Well, I haven't knowed you so very long.—Tit-Bits.

Compulsory Proportions.

"You're not half so stout as you were, Billy."

"No; we've moved into a flat, and I just had to get thin."—Indianapolis Journal.

She Was Willing to Help.

Beggar—Please, yer honor, do help a poor old body.

Irritable Old Chap—Don't bother me, woman. Can't you see that I couldn't possibly get a hand into my pockets?

Beggar—Ah, but perhaps I could, yer honor.

His Grasping Disposition.

"They say," remarked the mother thoughtfully, referring to the young man who had called the previous evening, "that he is of a grasping disposition."

"Well, I should say he was!" exclaimed the small boy.

"Willie!" cautioned his sister, but it was too late.

"You just ought to have seen the way he grasped Lou when she said she'd marry him," persisted the youngster.—Chicago Evening Post.

Crowded Out.

"Have you called on Penelope since she got back?"

"Yes, but I'll have to go again."

"Why?"

"She got started first in telling her summer experiences and I didn't get a word in edgewise about what I'd been doing all summer."—Chicago Record.

Discouraging.

"You are the first girl I ever loved," said Mr. Simper to Miss Kittish.

"In that case you may cease loving me. I do not care to be practiced on."

Correct.

"Johnny," queried the teacher of the new pupil, "do you know your alphabet?"

"Yes'm," answered Johnny.

"Well, then," continued the teacher, "what letter comes after A?"

"All the rest of them!" was the triumphant reply.

The Antithetical Chinaman.

To attempt to get a Chinaman to assign a reason for anything is futile. One day while riding a donkey through the country west of Peking I noticed that the women of the country villages, mostly farmers' wives and daughters, did not bind their feet. I said to the donkey driver who was running along beside me, "The country women do not bind their feet, do they?"

"No."

"Why?"

"They do not bind their feet."

"Why is it that the Chinese women bind their feet?"

"They bind their feet."

"But why do they do it?"

"That is their custom."

"But why is it their custom?"

"There is no why—no reason whatever."

Ask a child, "Why did your brother not come to school today?"

"My brother did not come to school today."

Or inquire of a man, "Why is it that the Chinese build a pagoda 13 stories high?" and he will most probably answer, "That is the way to build a pagoda."—Isaac Taylor Headland of University of Peking in Washington Star.

Had a Good Start.

Two colored men on a late Long street car were congratulating one another. The last to talk was newly wedded.

"Sam, I understand youse tookin unto youseself a new woman?" said Mr. Johnston.

"I'll kunfess I'ze guilty," meekly responded Sam, his countenance covered with a broad grin.

"Did you all get a good start?"

Sam was apparently very anxious to answer this question and in a much louder tone said:

"Well, I should say I did get a good start. I got an old woman wid eleben little pickaninnies."

Everybody who heard the remark was satisfied Sam had really a good start.—Columbus (O.) Dispatch.

"Those Loving Girls."

"Oh, yes," said the brunette, "it was very sweet of Marie to give me that blue gauze scarf. She knows I look a fright in blue, but the scarf is lovely and just the thing she wants to wear over her yellow hair. I'm not going to leave it around where she can borrow it, though. I'll keep it safely until her birthday next month, when I will have it dyed scarlet for her."—New York Mail and Express.

Scrofula

This root of many evils—

Glandular tumors, abscesses, pimples and other cutaneous eruptions, sore ears, inflamed eyelids, rickets, dyspepsia, catarrh, readiness to catch cold and inability to get rid of it easily, paleness, nervousness and other ailments including the consumptive tendency—

Can be completely and permanently removed, no matter how young or old the sufferer.

Hood's Sarsaparilla was given the daughter of Silas Vernooy, Wawarsing, N. Y., who had broken out with scrofula sores all over her face and head. The first bottle helped her and when she had taken six the sores were all healed and her face was smooth. He writes that she has never shown any sign of the scrofula returning.

DEVIL DANCERS OF CEYLON.

Earn a Good Living by Exorcising Demons from the Sick.

The real Singhalese devil dancers in Ceylon are most ferocious and savage fellows. Their dances are revolting and horrible. But their profession is popular and affords a royal living for the men who go into it.

There is a superstition among the Singhalese that when a man falls sick he is supposed to be afflicted with a devil. In order to rid him of the disease the devil dancers are called in to propitiate the demon.

Two or more of them go by night to the sick man's house, in front of which a small, square inclosure, about six feet high, has been made of grasses and palm leaves. This answers the purpose of the green room at a theater. The men appear at first without masks and with long yellow grass streamers hanging from their heads and waists. The only light cast on the scene is by torches made of sticks, around which pieces of cloth are wrapped, dipped in oil. To the music of a tom-tom, kept up on one note, the dancers sing a peculiar, wild, funeral dirge, in which the spectators often join.

The dancers begin by slowly moving about, stretching the right foot and bringing the left up to it, and appear as if they were searching for something, during which the singing sounds like crying. They are then asking the devil to appear. There are twenty-four different sorts of devils, and, after the first part, the dancers are constantly changing their clothes to represent the entire species; some wear masks, some don jaws and terrible teeth reaching to the ears; the jaws open and close in a very realistic manner.

A dance lasts over two nights, as the whole twenty-four devils have all to be personated before the particular demon who is afflicting the sick man is pitched on. When he gives signs of his presence the dancers go into a sort of frenzy, which increases as he takes possession of them; the tom-tom beats faster and faster, the chanting grows into yells, the men whirl and stamp, the bells fastened by bracelets on to their ankles jingle and clash.

At this stage the dancers appear to be looking for some object to give the devil in sacrifice, and into which he may pass. A chicken is usually offered by the friend of the sick man, and this unfortunate bird is seized upon, twisted and tormented and bitten between the false teeth, until the dancers, worn out, move slower and slower, and the chicken sinks into a sort of trance, which is a sign that the devil has accepted the sacrifice, and is willing to pass from the man into the bird. Now and then the bird is revived by some charmed water being thrown on its head, and then the torture of it begins again. After this the men don sheepskin petticoats and capes, and in the torchlight look more and more diabolical and frenzied in their thanks to the devil for consenting to leave the sick man.

When the bird dies it is a sign that the devil has left the man, and he will be cured. The bird is then thrown into the river, to be carried to the sea. It is never killed, and never eaten after dying. About an hour of this sort of thing is quite enough; it is really horrible and revolting, and one is thankful when the men leave off to go to drink the toddy prepared for them, and make a night of it.—New York Journal.

LITERARY LITTLE BITS

"April's Sowing" is Miss Gertrude Hall's first long story. The title is taken from Browning's "Pippa Passes."

Two weeks after its publication, 40,000 copies of "Alice in Old Vincennes" were sold. It is a story of American life by Maurice Thompson.

Wm. Dean Howells, the foremost figure in American letters to-day, is to be one of the literary advisers to the reorganized house of Harper & Bros.

Annie Russell Marble has written a book with a suggestive title, "Books That Nourish Us," published by T. J. Crowell & Co. It is certain that yearly come from the press books that give us neither temporary nor lasting nourishment, and the necessity arises for a wise choice.

Here is a story told in "Notes and Queries": A lady asked the novelist what her duty was in certain difficult circumstances, and received a clear reply. "But," she objected, "if I did that I should die." "Surely that has nothing to do with you doing your duty," answered George Eliot.

"The Biography of a Baby" is the title of an unusual volume by Miss Millicent W. Shinn. Miss Shinn is a Californian and still lives there. She has always been interested in babies, and has made a careful study of them both as teacher and friend. Published by the Century Company.

Apropos of prefaces—something that few care to praise—Mr. Kipling gives the following good advice, given when he was asked to write a preface: "Some rather interesting experiences have taught me that the best way of making a man hate me for life is to meddle in any way with his work. * * * If the book is good, it will go, and if not, nothing will make it stir. * * * All the men who want to stick a knife into me would stick it into you as soon as they saw my name prefacing your book. Bitter experience has taught that that kind of thing doesn't pay. If a book stands by itself, it will stand by itself; but if you use another chap's name to help it to a start, you will get all the whacks that the other chap would have got if he had written the book, in addition to a few whacks on your own merits."

It is folly to attempt to please everybody. It matters not in which direction a man faces he must of necessity turn his back on half the world.

Women either love or hate; there is no happy medium in their affections.

She Waited.

Even a Scotchman cannot always be humorous, if he would. Like other people, however, he is sometimes funny without meaning to be. The Scottish-American thinks that the message sent by a young man in Peeblesshire to his waiting bride may have kept her from worrying over his nonappearance, but that she must after all have received it with mixed feelings.

The bride elect lived in a village some distance from the home of William, the bridegroom. The wedding was to be at her home. On the eventful day the young man started for the station, but on the way met the village grocer, who talked so entertainingly that William missed his train.

Naturally he was in what is known as a "state of mind." Something must be done and done at once. So he sent the following telegram:

Don't marry till I come. WILLIAM.

If the bride elect knew her William, she probably knew how he felt when he sent the message and forgave the mental confusion which resulted in what she must have looked upon as a needless request.

When She Laughed.

In his volume on Ellen Terry Clement Scott tells of a somewhat self satisfied, vainglorious and grumpy actor who complained that the noted English actress continually laughed in one of his most important scenes. He had not the courage to tell her his objections, so he wrote her a letter of heartbroken complaint, in which he said: "I am extremely sorry to tell you that it is impossible for me to make any effect in such and such a scene if you persist in laughing at me on the stage and so spoiling the situation. May I ask you to change your attitude, as the scene is a most trying one?"

Miss Terry's answer was very direct and to the point, for she wrote: "You are quite mistaken. I never laugh at you on the stage. I wait till I get home."

The Point of His Warning.

"You ain't acquainted around here much, be you?" asked the mountaineer of the man on horseback.

"No."

"I reckoned not. I don't believe I'd go down the trail that runs past Abe Gore's shack if I wah you. Abe had his hoss stole last week."

"But this isn't his horse."

"You don't seem to understand. I ain't accusin you of stealin his hoss. I'm simply intimatin to you that at present Abe happens to be in need of a hoss purty bad. I wouldn't go down that road if I was you."—Indianapolis Sun.

One of Her Ways.

"The ways of the female shopper are beyond the ordinary salesman's ken," said a disgusted optician who is in business in the shopping section of the city. "A woman came in here the other day and asked the prices of all kinds and styles of spectacles and eyeglasses known to those in the trade. Finally, after a half hour's quizzing, she rustled out with the remark: 'Thank you, I expect to get a pair of glasses for a birthday present, and I just wanted to know about the prices of them.'"—Philadelphia Record.

Still More Counterfeiting.

The Secret Service has unearthed another band of counterfeiters, and secured a large quantity of bogus bills, which are so cleverly executed that the average person would never suspect them of being spurious. RESULT OF A FALL

SAN FRANCISCO ATTORNEY STRICKEN WITH PARALYSIS.

Shock to the System Brings on Nervous Prostration—How a Cure Was Effected.

It is doubtful if anything could be written more convincing than the interesting story related by Mr. Edward T. Dudley, a practicing attorney for twenty-five years in San Francisco, with offices at 83 City Hall Avenue. Mr. Dudley lost his balance while standing upon the rear platform of a street car, causing him to fall, striking the ground with the back of his head, which brought on a feeling of numbness and eventually paralysis. Mr. Dudley tells his experience in his own way, as follows:

"After the fall from the car I passed it by as an accident that had left no apparent ill effects; yet a few weeks later, in endeavoring to get on a car, I found I could not raise my foot. From this time paralysis began in my feet and in time my lower limbs became numb. I became pale as a ghost and it brought on a bloodless condition of my system. From being a strong healthy man of 180 pounds, I was reduced to 145 pounds, and my doctor told my wife that it was only a question of time when I should have to take my bed. Medicine prescribed by the doctors did no good, and at the time I started to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, if I fell down, I could not possibly get up again unassisted. I could scarcely walk a block. Now I can walk three or four miles without fatigue, and, as you see, am altogether a different man—and all from eight or nine boxes of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

"After trying Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, I could see in a very short time that I was picking up color and my health and general system was much improved. I did not change my diet, nor did I take any other medicine, and my increase in weight from 145 to 185 pounds I can lay to nothing else than Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

MARTIN'S FIREMAN.

DID you ever hear of a railway president running as fireman on an engine? Well, I know of one who did, and, if you've got time to listen to it, I will tell you the story now.

It was in the summer of 1885 that I was firing on a single track line that runs up from Junction City through Georgetown, a matter of 110 miles. The line was owned mostly by a man named Thedford, who was president and superintendent all in one.

I had been firing on the line for two years back; all the time with one driver, Bob Hunter by name, and a finer man never lived. I suppose it would be only natural for me to speak well of Bob, anyway, for I was clean head over ears in love with his pretty daughter, Molly, and was only waiting for a bit of rise in my pay to make her Mrs. Jim Martin. Though I didn't see any chance for that rise where I was, I didn't like to leave and go on another line, for that would take me away from Molly.

One day Bob says to me:

"Jim, ain't you and Molly never going to get married?"

"Just as soon as I can get my rise," says I, "but I don't see how I'm going to get it here."

"Why don't you go and ask Billy?" says he.

You see, Billy was always what we called Mr. Thedford—behind his back, of course—for warrant you, we were mighty polite to his face.

'He won't do anything for me," says I, "for you know either one of the cleaners up to Georgetown would be glad enough to jump into my place, and he ain't going to give me a rise just to please me."

"Well," says Bob, "it won't do any hurt to try it."

So next day I washed up and went to the company's office, and asked for Mr. Thedford. After a few minutes he sent word to me that he would see me, and in I went. There he sat—a large, heavily built man, with big side whiskers and a pair of gold-rimmed glasses on his nose.

"What is it, my man? I'm very busy," says he.

So I up and told him what I wanted.

"How much are you getting now?" says he.

"Forty-five dollars a month," says I.

"I don't see how we can give you anything more, my good fellow. You see, yours is not a very responsible position; merely one that requires a little bodily strength. And we can find plenty of men who would be only too glad to take your place at that salary."

With that he turned to a letter he was writing, and I knew I had no more business there. I tell you I felt sore to be told it didn't take much to know how to fire an engine, and I came mighty near throwing my job up and trying to get on another line. But Molly persuaded me to hold on a little longer.

Now, before I come to the particular point of this yarn, I want to tell you a little about the line. I have said it was a single track one running from Junction City to Georgetown. The latter place was a little town of 500 or 600 inhabitants; but in the summer a great many Chicago people came up there, and so I suppose the line paid. Anyhow, Thedford, who had a summer place there, was rich enough to run it for himself alone if he wanted to.

Bob lived at Georgetown and I boarded with him. Our trips began at 8 in the morning, and we generally ran the 110 miles in five hours. Then at 3 in the afternoon we came back, getting home at 8. As soon as we reached the roundhouse at Georgetown our day's work was over, for the cleaners took the engine then, cleaned and polished her, and laid the fire already to start the next morning.

Well, as I said, I hung on to my job, hoping that something would turn up that would give me a lift, till one day in August. The whole summer had been uncommon hot, but that day went ahead of anything I ever saw. Of course while we were running we had a breeze, but the minute we stopped it seemed as if we were in a furnace, and naturally, working as we were near a hot fire didn't improve things.

On the home trip Bob was taken sick and had all he could do to hold out till we got to the home station, when he got home as soon as possible. After the train was emptied I ran the engine to the roundhouse, expecting to go straight home and wash up. But when I ran the engine in the first thing I saw was my two cleaners laid out on a heap of ashes, dead drunk.

Here was a pretty mess, for it would certainly take me until midnight to get the machine in proper trim for the next day's run; and a hot, greasy job it was in any weather, but on such a night as that it was frightful to think of it. However, there was no help for it, and I started in.

I had barely made a beginning when I heard someone coming in at the door. Looking up, I saw that it was Billy Thedford. In a very excited voice he asked where Hunter was.

"Home," I said, "and so sick he can't hold his head up."

"Heavens!" said he; "I shall be ruined!"

Then he went on to say that if he wasn't in Chicago the next day, some deal, I think he called it, would fall through, and it would cost him a quarter of a million.

"There's a train goes through Junction City at 11:05 that will get you to Chicago in time," says I.

"What good'll that do me?" says he. "I've been away for two days, and only just now got the telegram. If Hunter was here he might get me down; but as it is I may as well go home and let the money go."

"Mr. Thedford," said I, "Bob is sick, but I can run this machine to Junction City in time to connect with the train you want; but you will have to fire for me, as my two cleaners are drunk, as you see, and there isn't another man in this village knows the engine from the tender hardly."

I hope that I have been forgiven that lie, forthere were two or three men that could have fired all right, but it struck me all of a sudden that here was a fine chance to get even with Billy, and let him see whether it took any knowhow to fire an engine for a 110-mile run. It so happened that we had just wooded up on the home trip at a little station three miles from Georgetown, so we had plenty of fuel aboard to make the run with.

"Can you do it?" says he, "remember it is 110 miles, and it is 8:30 now, so you have only two and a half hours to make the run that generally takes double that time."

"I can do it," says I, "if you will jump aboard, pull off your coat, and do just as I tell you."

No sooner said than done, and in ten minutes we had the old engine on the turntable, turned her around and were off.

If the road was rough when we ran at our usual speed, that night, making double time, it was just awful. As we flew around the curves it seemed as if we should lose the track at every turn of the drivers, and the poor old machine rocked and swayed so that, used as I was to it, I could hardly keep on my seat by the lever.

If it was hard on me, what must it have been to poor old Billy? I could hardly keep from laughing in his face, as I watched him and heard him groan as he handled the heavy sticks we used for fuel.

The heat of the weather, added to that of the furnace and the unusual work, made him look as if he was in a Turkish bath. The water ran down his face, his stiff, white collar hung down on his shoulders like a wet rag, and his beautiful, smooth bosom looked as if some one had thrown a pail of dirty water over him. His hands were torn and cut from handling the wood, and take it altogether he was the most unlikely looking railway president I ever saw. Once in a while I had to shout at him to lay the wood even in the furnace, and would tell him he would get the knack of it in time.

Whenever he tried to rest I told him we were losing steam, and if he wanted to catch that train he mustn't idle over the work. If I had thought to hitch a car on when we started we should have run much smoother; but it was too late to think of that now, and so on we rushed(now through woodlands, now past grain fields, lurching first to one side and then to the other, until I expected every minute to land wrong side up in the ditch.

However, luck was with us that night, and we pulled up at Junction City at just 11. Poor old Billy could hardly climb down from the engine, but he managed to gasp out:

"Come to my office at 2 o'clock next Saturday."

I learned afterward that, finding the Chicago train was behind time, he hunted up a clothing shop and rigged himself up so as to look like a civilized man, which he didn't when he left me.

I managed to find a fireman who was willing to make the run back with me, and I finally got home at 3 o'clock, and finding the cleaners a little sobered up, got to bed as soon as possible, for I was clean played out. I told Bob about my trip next day, and thought he would die laughing to think of old Billy playing fireman. But all he said was:

"I'm afraid that'll settle your hash, Jim, for he will find out that you worked him more than was needed."

The next Saturday, at 2 o'clock, I reported at the president's office, wondering whether I was going to be rewarded for my extra work or get kicked out for my impudence.

When I entered the office there sat the old man, spick and span as ever, and showing no signs of his hard work.

"Well, young man," says he, "you helped me out the other night, but I would not go through the same experience again for $10,000. At the same time I think you were trying to get even with me for not doing what you asked about your salary, and I have concluded that this line can dispense with your services."

At this my heart went down into my boots, for I can tell you it isn't an easy thing to get a new job when you can't bring a recommendation from your last place.

Then he went on to say:

"I have a letter here from the superintendent of the Chicago and Western, asking if I can recommend to them a driver who has a sharp eye and cool head to run their new fast night express. I have written in reply that I can recommend such a man, one James Martin, who will report for service the 1st of September. The pay will be $100 a month. I may add to you privately that I shall never apply to you for the position of fireman. Good day, sir."

That's all there is to my story. Molly and I were married and went to Chicago to live. I took the new train, and have brought her in on time every trip I've run, so you can see I've a pretty good record with the company. I've never seen Billy since, and I don't believe he wants to see me, for Bob told me the last time I saw him that they called the old man "Martin's fireman," that he knew it, and naturally didn't like it. There's my mate signaling for me now, sir, and I must go.

MADE A SLIGHT MISTAKE.

White Ribbons Do Not Mean the Same Thing in All Places.

During the recent convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in this city members of the reception committee were on duty at the railroad passenger stations for the purpose of according a proper welcome to incoming delegates. Among those assigned to the work at the Pennsylvania depot was a particularly attractive young woman, who was ambitious as she was inexperienced as regards the work of greeting strangers.

A train rolled in, and as the passengers alighted therefrom the attractive young woman was all in a flutter. She scanned the stream of humanity as it filed through the big gate and at length espied a well-dressed gentleman, who not only wore a silk hat but also a white ribbon attached to the lapel of his coat. The attractive young woman rushed to meet the well-dressed gentleman as eagerly as though he were her long-lost brother.

"So glad to see you," she exclaimed. "Come right along and I will conduct you to comfortable quarters."

The wearer of the silk hat and the white ribbon was rendered speechless for a moment. He finally managed to gasp:

"Beg pardon, miss, but isn't this a mistake?"

"Can't be a mistake," the attractive young woman hurriedly declared. "You see, we both wear the white ribbon."

"And what does yours represent?" the stranger then wanted to know.

"Why, it's the badge of the W. C. T. U., of course."

"Well, mine is the color of the winning horse in the last race at the Bennings race track this afternoon," smilingly explained the well-dressed gentleman.

Consternation and apologies followed. —Washington Star.

AS HE SAW A GRAND OPERA.

Philadelphia Reporter Gives His Impressions of the Performance.

At the opera last evening Philadelphia's best and bonniest turned out to listen to the delightful strains. Mme. Melba sang the leading role and every box was filled—her voice being in excellent condition—in all three tiers. De Rezke also sang, the Van Buster-Biddles occupying the first prosecenium box of Germantown. Mrs. Van Buster-Biddle wore a corn-colored gown trimmed with Yildiz sequins in bunches, the bodice cut on the slant. De Rezke never sang his role with better effect. Three of the boxes contained the Bigler-DeGauze wedding party, while the fourth in the lower tier was occupied by Mrs. Fitz Boodle, it being her first appearance in society since obtaining her decree. The orchestra was unusually good, though the gems of the score were somewhat outclassed by the gems displayed by Mrs. Fairmount Todgers, whose tiara was a blaze of iridescent splendor.

The entrance of a majority of the elite was largely marred by the stupidity of the manager, who persisted in continuing the first act while so many of our society's best were seeking their seats. Another gaucherie that was widely criticised was Mme. Melba's lack of good taste in responding to a final call when our leading society dames had already quite as much as they wanted of the opera, donning their ermine and sable wraps preparatory to returning home.

All in all, however, it was a highly successful performance, it being roughly estimated that there were at least $250,000 worth of good jewelry displayed by the gilded social favorites who favored the operatic management by their presence.

The opera was "Faust."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Taking His Measure.

"What kind of a man is this John Smith?"

"Oh, he's the kind that thinks he can hold on to his umbrella by having his name engraved on the handle."—New York Evening World.

"So dark and yet so light," said the funny man as he looked at a ton of coal the driver had just delivered.

OLD-TIME WOOD SAWING.

Horse-Power Mill Is Still Widely Used in Country Districts.

"Well, there is one time-honored old institution that hasn't kept step with the march of the ages," said a man out in one of the suburbs of Chicago the other day, as he pointed to an old horse-power sawmill that was running full blast.

"The old machine does seem to be about the same as it was when we were boys, replied the man who had been addressed.

"That's right; it's the same thing to a dot, and if I'm not mistaken that is the identical old horse that I saw running a machine about forty-three years ago. He is keeping up the pace all right, but he seems to have been left at the distance pole by the ages. He keeps going all right, but he never gets anywhere."

HORSE TREADMILL AND BUZZSAW.

"But he saws the cordwood up all right. You shouldn't expect more. Even a horse can't say anything when he is sawing wood."

"Nevertheless it does seem strange that while everything else in the world has been advancing, progressing and improving this old horse-power sawmill has remained stationary, absolutely untouched by a single change that would better it."

"If you gentlemen will excuse me for cutting into your conversation instead of continuing to cut wood for a minute I will enlighten you a little about this business, which seems to trouble you so much," said the man who had been busily engaged in pushing sticks against the buzz saw. "The point is right here," continued the man with the saw, "you gentlemen are flying a little too far above the ground. In other words, you don't know what you are talking about. You are complaining that a machine has not improved when, as a matter of fact, it reached a state of perfection when both of you were children. The horse-power sawmill can't be made better than it now is, for there is absolutely no chance for improvement.

"I suppose you think that the dawn of the twentieth century should have found these machines run by electricity. Why should we go to the expense of having this run by electricity when we can run it for nothing. This old horse you see walking up hill in the machine isn't worth 50 cents at a horse market. He is 39 years old, is blind in both eyes, is string-halted and has four other diseases, but he furnishes all of the power we need and just as good power as might be desired for sawing cordwood, and all he costs me is his feed, and I might add that he has a very poor appetite. There you are—that is the whole proposition in a nutshell. Why should I want power that would cost me ten or twenty times as much to run this saw when I can have it run for next to nothing?"

Then the suburbanite went back to his work and vigorously began pushing big sticks of wood against the whirling saw, while the old horse plodded upward without ever reaching any top, and the two men from Chicago looked on for a moment at the operation and then turned away without venturing any response to the remarks of the sawyer. They confided at last to each other that they guessed the twentieth century had not left the horse-power sawmill so very far behind, after all. In the country districts and rural neighborhoods the old-fashioned mill is as common as it was several decades ago, for it is still found to be the best and cheapest method of cutting wood into the right lengths for the stove and the fireplace.—Chicago Chronicle.

World's Largest Prison.

France's new prison at Fresnes, some eight miles from Paris, is the largest in the world. It takes the place of three old prisons, is situated in a healthy district and covers, with its main buildings, flower gardens and villa residence of officials, over half a square mile.

The prison, unlike our penitentiaries, is not built on the star plan, but consists of five rectangular blocks, one of which is the infirmary. The plan is the cellular and the number of cells reaches the huge total of 1,824. As, however, accommodation is provided on the "association" system for 400 privileged prisoners, the total criminal capacity of the Fresnes prison is 2,224. As a sanitarium for the criminal Fresnes is unique. As his or her present home it boasts the proud record of being only half full of crime, or at least punishment by imprisonment for crime is diminishing in France.

The system at Fresnes is interesting; possibly it is worthy of imitation. The authorities believe in fresh air and sunshine, those sworn foes of the microbe and friends of health. Hence, as already stated, the prison is a model sanitarium. Otherwise the criminal is gently educated. He works at some trade and can purchase from the proceeds of his work extra food and personal requirements—with the exception of tobacco. When the prisoners go to worship, which is not compulsory, or to "school," which is, they wear hoods so as to prevent mutual recognition on release. In some of the workshops this rule does not obtain. The reason for this apparent inconsistency is not clear.

Besant Cowed the Cab Driver.

Sir Walter Besant is known in England as one of the best amateur boxers in the land. He has more than once given proof of the possession of both science and muscle, and although he is by no means quarrelsome his friends discreetly avoid giving him offense. He is credited with having once settled a disputed cab fare in a novel manner. He drove from Piccadilly to some place in the suburbs outside the radius. On getting down he tendered the driver 3 shillings and 6 pence, which was a little over the proper fare. The man, however, wanted 5 shillings. Besant refused.

"I'd like to fight you for it," said the driver.

"The very thing," said Besant. "We'll have the fight in the back garden. My brother will look on, hold the stakes and see fair."

The cabman got down slowly, as if he did not quite care about it after all. He followed into the garden, where there was a lovely bit of green turf. Besant placed the 5 shillings in his friend's hands, took off his coat and waistcoat and rolled up his sleeves—all with the air of cheerful alacrity.

"Now, my friend," said he, "I am ready as soon as you are." His anxiety was great, but it decreased as he watched the cabman's face express successively all the emotions of bounce, surprise, doubt, hesitation and abject cowardice.

"No, no," he said at last. "Gimme the three-and-six. I know your tricks —both of you. I've been done this way before."

Puzzles for the Postman.

The other day a fair Baltimorean gave a man relative two postal cards to mail. He did not look at either until he was about to drop them in the box. Then he found one was addressed,—

"The wine shop on Blank avenue with the big demijohn in front of the door;" and the other: "Ida, Pearl street, between Fayette and the next street."

The masculine relative didn't mail the cards; he took them back to the writer instanter.

"See here," he said, "you can't expect things directed in this careless fashion to reach their destination. Why, it would take an Old Sleuth to hunt these people up. If I were a postman——"

The woman took the cards from him and looked at them. "If you were a postman," she said, "you'd have more sense than you have now. There's nothing the matter with those addresses. Take the cards and mail them."

And sure enough, the next day the wine shopman responded and the cook Ida returned to her labors, so the woman thinks that is sufficient justification of her methods, and keeps right on forgetting numbers and giving the postmen puzzles to work out.

The burning at the stake of a negro on the soil of Kansas will strike many people as being a historical paradox, says the Chicago Tribune. For the ten years just previous to the Civil War the battle for the negro's freedom was mainly fought in the then Territory of Kansas, at least so far as actual physical violence was concerned. John Brown lived in Osawatomie, Kan., with his sons, and there commenced the attacks on slavery which ended with his capture at Harper's Ferry. There was civil war in Kansas over the slavery question as early as 1856. Its soil was invaded by a "Northern army" and by Southern sympathizers. Men were shot, hanged, tarred and feathered on both sides. Pitched battles were fought and more than one Kansas town was burned to the ground.

The fight for the control of Kansas became active when in 1854 Congress passed resolutions organizing the Territory, to be admitted later as a State, with or without slavery. Immediately a body of pro-slavery men from Missouri crossed the river and laid out Leavenworth, the first city in the Territory. During the next month a body of emigrants from Massachusetts, sent out as an anti-slavery colony, settled at Lawrence and organized a "squatter government." Andrew H. Reeder of Pennsylvania was appointed the first Governor of the Territory. Meanwhile the slavery men of Missouri were forming societies and planning for controlling the government of Kansas. When the first election for a Territorial delegate to Congress was held they swarmed over the river and succeeded in securing the election of the pro-slavery candidate.

When the first Legislature met at Pawnee the pro-slavery members at once drove out the few "free soil" members and changed the seat of government. Meanwhile Governor Reeder had been accused of official irregularities and was removed from office, and a convention of "Free-Sollers" met and repudiated all the acts of the Legislature. Wilson Shannon of Ohio was appointed to succeed Reeder as Governor, and he got to his new scene of duty just in time for serious trouble. The former Governor, Reeder, had been elected to Congress by the "free soil" party, and the slavery men met in convention and declared that to decline to obey the laws passed by the recent Legislature was treason. Two or three men were killed in quarrels over this question, and a body of 800 "free soil" men, including John Brown and his four sons, enlisted to protect themselves, while 1,500 armed Missourians marched over to oppose them. Governor Shannon was able to prevent a collision and both forces finally dispersed. Amidst tremendous excitement and much violence on both sides a "free soil" constitution was adopted in December, 1855. Under this constitution Charles Robinson was elected Governor. But this action was nullified by President Pierce, who in a special message to Congress recognized the first Legislature and declared that the Robinson government was revolutionary. In order to carry out the effects of this message the United States troops in Kansas were put under command of the Territorial Governor. But the "free soil" Legislature met in spite of the Presidential prohibition. While they were in session a large body of slavery men from Georgia, Alabama, and South Carolina entered Kansas, and the grand jury of Douglas County indicted the "free soil" Governor, Robinson, and all the leaders associated with him on a charge of high treason. Former Governor Reeder, who had been chosen Territorial Representative in Congress, and Governor Robinson were arrested for high treason. The authorities arrested many other free soil leaders at Lawrence and destroyed the Emigrant Aid Society Hotel and the Herald of Freedom printing office.

Then civil war broke out in deadly earnest. Captain Pate started out with an armed body to "destroy old Brown" at Osawatomie. For more than a month the fighting continued, and the Missouri River was closed to the passage of "free soil" emigrants.

Meanwhile the national government was taking a hand in the struggle. A bill admitting Kansas as a State was passed by the lower house of Congress in June, 1856. Under this bill the "free soil" constitution was recognized. On that account it was defeated in the Senate. When the "free soil" Legislature attempted to meet in Topeka it was dispersed by United States troops acting under order of President Pierce.

All over the country the fight for Kansas was exciting great interest and many organizations were formed to assist either the "Free-Sollers" or the pro-slavery party. The civil war in the Territory continued with increasing violence.

During the next few years events of sensational interest followed fast. Governor Shannon was removed. The Territory was declared to be in a state of open insurrection and rebellion. A number of pitched battles were fought between the "free soil" and pro-slavery forces, in which honors were almost equally divided; Territorial Governors were removed, resigned, and fled the State in rapid succession; John Brown and his men made a raid into Missouri, liberated fourteen slaves, and brought them back to Kansas; Horace Greeley and Abraham Lincoln made speeches within the boundaries of the State and gradually the "free soil" forces gained control. Finally, in 1860 the National House of Representatives voted to admit Kansas as a State under the so-called Wyandotte constitution. The bill was passed by the Senate in January, 1861, and immediately approved. Charles Robinson was the first State Governor. From a civil war of its own the new State was plunged immediately into the greater war which involved the whole country.

A WILD RIDE.

Broken Harness Gives a Stage-Coach a Perilous Descent.

The descent from the easiest pass across the Blue Ridge Mountains thereabouts, known as Snicker's Gap, to the Shenandoah River is long and steady. At regular intervals a little elevation of solid earth, also known as a brake, has been banked up across the road, to keep it from being washed away by the heavy rains. A ferry, propelled by the river current, carries the stage coach across the Shenandoah, which flows at the foot of the mountain.

One day the coach, well loaded with passengers and their baggage, had attained a fair speed, when an accident to the harness occurred. The driver could not turn the vehicle in against the high banks on either side without upsetting it, and perhaps maiming its occupants. There was nothing to do but to "keep the horses on their feet and guide them."

Every time he reached one of the mounds across the road he had to exercise the greatest skill in steering over it squarely; but by cooiness and presence of mind he brought his load safely, although at a tremendous speed, down the mountain. From long experience he knew where it was possible to drive into the river without getting beyond his depth, and as he boldly plunged his team into the stream an effective brake upon its speed began to operate. It soon came to a standstill, and the terror-stricken passengers drew a long breath once more. Row-boats came out after them, the harness and brakes were repaired, and the journey resumed.

It is not strange that this one occasion of the thousands of times this man had been down the mountain should stand out distinct in his memory. This is the way history is made up. Ordinary occurrences are forgotten while an unusual event is remembered, the marvelousness of it seeming even to increase with the years; and the history of nations is but the enlarged form of the history of every-day life.

WON A TITLE WITH HIS GUN.

Hiram S. Maxim Is Now a Knight of the British Empire.

Hiram Stevens Maxim, upon whom the order of knighthood was conferred by Queen Victoria, became a naturalized British subject on September 16, 1899. He has lived in England since 1883, going thither because of the lack of appreciation shown by the United States government for his famous inventions in gunnery. Mr. Maxim, or Sir Hiram Maxim, as he must now be called, is not only an inventor of automatic guns but has paid attention to electricity and other branches of mechanical art. His time now is devoted largely to attempts to perfect a flying machine, and he has spent no inconsiderable part of his enormous fortune in experiments along this line. For his achievements in electrical experiment he was decorated in 1881 with the cross of the Legion of Honor by President Grevy of France. The firm of which he is a member employs 14,000 persons and turns out everything required in war from the smallest automatic gun to a complete battleship. The new British knight is 60 years old and is a native of Yaungersville, Me.

MAXIM AND HIS INVENTION.

Not Very Guilty.

Somewhat suggestive of the Scotch verdict, "Not proven," is the judgment rendered in a Western town when, says the Green Bag, the most popular citizen had soundly whipped a tough character.

To vindicate the majesty of the law, the offender was brought up for trial. The jury were out about two minutes.

"Well," said the judge, in a familiar, offhand way, "what have the jury to say?"

"May it please the court," responded the foreman, "we, the jury, find that the prisoner is not guilty of hittin' with intent to kill, but simply to paralyze; and he done it."

The verdict was received with applause, and the prisoner received an ovation.

What He Meant.

"That was the year," said Jesse Sparhawk to the little group of listeners who had gathered to hear his reminiscences of war times, "that was the very year that my cellar was so unmercifully overflowed."

"What do you mean by 'unmercifully overflowed,' I'd like to know?" demanded Mr. Potts, the town trial, from the outskirts of the group. "I don't gather your sense."

"I mean," said Mr. Sparhawk, after a glare at the offender who had thus arrested him in the full tide of recollection, "that there was too much water for walking, an' not enough for boating. I sh'd think 'twas plain enough."

AN ALARMING CONDITION.

The fact is patent that woman during the past twenty-five years has invaded the fields of man's activity to a degree that is either alarming or beneficent—there is no middle ground. The "Record-Union" has for many years held that the former is the proper view; that women by entry upon commercial lines of activity are being weaned away from domesticity to the injury of both sexes and the grave disorder of society. That the invasion, in short, is bad, very bad, and has no redeeming feature.

Mrs. Flora McDonald Thompson, a well known contributor to literary and other journals for many years, and a keen student of social conditions at the head of a department in "Harper's Bazaar," holds that woman's true place is the home. She deplores the departure of her sex into the fields of business and away from domesticity, and thinks the fact indicates a gloomy outlook for the future of the country. We fully agree with her, save in the matter of the "future outlook," for already the evil is upon us. Woman has stepped down visibly and dangerously in the estimation of men. She has smirched her garments with the grime of trade already to such an extent that young men are fearing entry into matrimony and the service of women in housewifely arts has largely become a thing to be sneered at by women as servile and to be avoided, in favor of the shop, the counter, the office desk, the stock agency, and the bustle and vulgarity of the market. In the "North American Review" the same sound thinking and prescient writer says:

That the economically ideal organization of the American family has been overthrown by the aggressive spirit of the "new" woman appears with amazing clearness. * * * Over 17 per cent. of the whole number of persons employed in all occupations are women. Furthermore, the United States Commissioner of Labor has found the number of women so employed to be constantly increasing, and that at the expense of men; the percentage of the increase of women, in every given instance, showing a corresponding decrease of men. In this connection, still another suggestive fact appears in the statistics of the United States Department of Labor. In proportion as women advance in men's industries, and thus cause the retirement of men, the latter engage in domestic labor and personal service. The American woman competes with man, not alone to his disadvantage, but to his degradation.

That is well and bravely said. Men suffer from the competition of women not only by the under cut of wages, but in the farther remove of the ideal home from their hopes. Young men have a very dreary outlook nowadays for real helpmeets. They may secure female partners, but their chances of raising up daughters to honor housewifery and the home circle, are growing less steadily. Mrs. Thompson continues:

Involved with this chaos in the industrial order, revolution with reference to sex constantly advances in the domain of American politics. We have woman suffrage to some extent existing in a number of States and in several Territorids of the United States, and absolutely unrestricted woman suffrage in four States—making a total of almost three-fifths of the whole number of States in the Union which have in some way yielded political power to woman. Also we have the American woman clamoring for every office in the gift of the people, from President to Police Court Justice.

It was to be expected that Elizabeth Cady Stanton would reply to Mrs. Thompson and antagonize her views. But she does not make a strong case. She cites the careers of Maria Mitchell, the astronomer; of Widow Green, the inventor of the cotton gin; of Margaret Fuller, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Charlotte Cushman, Ellen Terry and many others who have become eminent in public life. But that is worn and threadbare argument. It is silly to ask if women at the washtub are better off than these distinguished representatives of the sex. The objection has never been made to woman in the fine arts, in the drama, literature, charity promotion, the hospital, the school and in reform movements.

Mrs. Stanton must get down out of the clouds and answer concerning the hundreds of thousands of shop girls, of maids and matrons in business, undercutting man's wages; of tens of thousands avoiding and despising housewifely arts; of the half million in business offices where all the influences are hardening and in many cases debasing; of the decline of domestic service; of the slavery of female factory operatives; of the crowding out of men from the place of the true bread winner by women who have no need to work for wages, as well as those driven by necessity to labor in fields of business to maintain dependent parent or relatives.

When Mrs. Stanton asks if the farmer's wife at the washtub is doing more for the country that the women she named as eminent in literature, invention, drama, astronomy, etc., we answer unhesitatingly yes, if she is a good wife to the farmer, a good mother to her children, a good woman to society. For she is doing that which must be done and is laboring less painfully, more profitably, more unselfishly, more nobly and more to her honor and the good of the country, than are the misses with pencils in their back hair, the smudge of the shop on their bosoms, and the meager earnings they receive in their pockets that great manufacturers, merchants, traders, shippers and others may reap larger profits, while capable men in vain seek employment from which women debar them, and hence are unable to found homes and become the caretakers they should be.

NEW RAILROAD WITH MILLIONS.

Incorporation of the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Line.

A press dispatch from Salt Lake, Mar. 20th, says: The incorporation papers of the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad were filed here with the Secretary of State to-day. The capital stock of the company is placed at $25,000,000 and the corporate existence is fixed at one hundred years. The officers of the company are: President, Senator W. A. Clark, Butte, Mont.; first vice president, R. C. Kerens, St. Louis, Mo.; second vice president, J. Ross Clark, Butte, Mont.; third vice president, T. E. Gibbon, Los Angeles; secretary, T. F. Miller, Los Angeles, treasurer, F. K. Rule, Los Angeles.

In addition to the above officers, with the exception of treasurer, the following are directors: G. B. Seighton, St Louis; Perry S. Heath, Washington; Senator Thomas Kearns, Salt Lake: W. S. McCornick, Salt Lake; E. W. Clark, Salt Lake; Charles W. Clark, Butte.

Of the capital stock of the company $2 501 600 has been subscribed and fully paid up. The first meeting of the board will be held to-morrow morning to adopt by-laws and appoint a general manager and chief engineer. Active construction will be started at once from the Los Angeles end and a party of surveyors will be at once sent out from Salt Lake to locate this end of the line. The deed transferring the Los Angeles Terminal Railway Company to the new corporation bears $5000 in revenue stamps and in addition $2500 in fees was paid to the Secretary of State for filing articles of incorporation. The charter of the new company was issued this afternoon.

Imperils Salt Lake Line.

A dispatch from Los Angeles to the S. F. Call, of March 20, says: Local speculators are unloading their holdings of Burlington stock. One sagacious speculator let go of 1000 shares yesterday at $168. To day he had reason to be glad.

The ups and downs of Burlington stock mean much to Los Angeles, as they are evidently influenced by the prospective fate, not only of the Burlington road, but of the new Salt Lake line known as the Clark enterprise. The San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake railroad project depends now solely upon the continuance of the Burlington road in the hands of the present owners and independent of the Union Pacific and Vanderbilt interests. If the Burlington were to pass into the control of the people that have the Union Pacific and the Southern Pacific it would "knock" all projects of a new line to Salt Lake that could in any way be considered a competitor.

Construction of the new road will begin within thirty days. Several thousand ties are now at San Pedro and several carloads of seventy-five pound rails are on their way from Chicago. The articles of transfer of the Terminal Railway properties to the new line will be filed immediately upon the return of J. Ross Clark and T. E. Gibbons to this city. These embody the franchises, the terminal properties and rolling stock of the Terminal Railway, the consideration to be paid in stock of the new company. Right of way is being rapidly acquired along the survey of the road, and promise of an early completion to Highlands is given.

It is rumored that the Clark road will go through Wingate Pass, 24 miles south of Ballarat, at the southern end of the Panamint mountains; pass Coleman's borax works up the Amargosa by Resting Springs and Ash Meadows; thence north through a country rich in mineral to the Utah line. If the road is built on the route named, there will be at least fifty miles of it in Inyo county.

Our Mines.

The Reward mine, about 12 miles from Independence, is a regular bullion producer. The ore body at bottom of incline is fully 20 feet wide. The ledge on the several levels is looking well and enough ore is taken out doing development work to keep their 10-stamp mill steadily running. About 30 men are employed.

The sinking of the incline in the Eclipse mine is progressing satisfactorily. The ledge is over 5 feet in width at the bottom and the indications are favorable for the opening up of a large body of ore in the near future. Six men are employed.

Barnes & McIver have done considerable development work on their claim during the past few months, and from present appearance, they have undoubtedly a mine that will soon be listed among the bullion producers.

Anderson & Nibecker have eight men employed at their mine and mill. The ore being run is of excellent quality and the returns are all that could be asked for. Their new concentrator is in place and doing its work to perfection.

The M. & W. Co., have 8 men employed doing development work.

The Montezuma mine is a constant shipper of lead ore.

Bee Keepers' Meeting.

A meeting of the Inyo County Bee Keepers' Association will be held at the Valley View Hotel in Bishop on Friday, April 12th, at 1 p. m. Matters of importance and interest to bee-keepers will be presented and discussed.

WM. MUTH-RASMUSSEN, Secretary.

The Inyo Mercantile Co is arranging to have its entire establishment lighted with the new Welsbach burners, for which they have taken the agency for Independence and vicinity. One of these lights are equal to one hundred candle power as against the 50 candle power of the old style largest coal oil lamps. The light is a steady white light and the cost of lighting is less than one-fourth of the coal oil light lamps.

Don't forget the Grand Ball on the evening on the evening of April 26th.

Substitutes for Coal.

A workman, Mr. Montag, in a dye and soda factory in Mannheim, Germany, has invented a substitute for coal, which it is claimed can be made for 25 cents per 220 pounds. Our Consul, Mr. Frankenthal, at Berne, Switzerland, has been much impressed by the claim and reports to the State Department upon it. He says that peat is the base of the substance which, with the addition of certain chemicals, secret as yet with the inventor, produces a fuel that gives forth great heat, leaves no slag, burns with a bright flame and shows but a small quantity of white ash. The Consul adds:

Certain Mannheim capitalists have tried to obtain the secret from the inventor by offering him a position as director in a company to be established, giving him a salary of $4,000 and 2 per cent of the net profits; but he has refused this offer, because he wants to control the sale of the invention himself. Capitalists now claim that Montag asks too high a price. Mr. Gehrig, the Secretary of the Mannheim Chamber of Commerce, has, it is said, undertaken to procure the necessary means to commence the manufacture of the article in partnership with the inventor. They have bought twenty-five acres of peat land and have bonded 125 more in the vicinity of Hockenheim, where they will erect the necessary buildings, large enough to keep several hundred men at work. It is figured that that the daily output will be sixty tons. It is said that the peat is thoroughly dried, ground by a machine, mixed with chemicals, and pressed into brick shape.

This is, of course, if genuine, an important discovery, and if practical and economic means a revolution in the matter of fuel supply in many parts of the world. For peat is practically inexhaustible, and is to be had in most parts though not profusely distributed in large beds. But it occurs more frequently than do coal fields and it is reproductive. It is partly decomposed vegetable matter, and has many forms, dependent upon climate and character of vegetation. But in the constant discovery of new earth oil fields, which yield fuel oils, there would seem to be an easier solution of the fuel question and one that promises greater economy than the peat basis fuel.—Weekly Union.

From the above report of Consul it would appear that the manufactured fuel must sell at a high figure in order to be remunerative. The employment of several hundred men with an output of only sixty tons per day looks to us to be an extravagant outlay for a small amount of fuel.

A VERY PROMINENT MAN

Owes Health and Happiness to Pe-ru-na.

Congressman Howard from Alabama.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 4th, 1899.

Pe-ru-na Drug M'f'g Co., Columbus, O.:

Gentlemen—I have taken Pe-ru-na now for two weeks, and find I am very much relieved. I feel that my cure will be permanent. I have also taken it for la grippe, and I take pleasure in recommending Pe-ru-na as an excellent remedy to all fellow sufferers.

Very Respectfully,
M. W. Howard.

Congressan Howard's home address is Fort Payne, Ala.

Any man who wishes perfect health must be entirely free from catarrh. Catarrh is well-nigh universal; almost onipresent. Pe-ru-na is the only absolute safeguard known. A cold is the beginning of catarrh. To prevent colds, to cure colds, is to cheat catarrh out of its victims. Address Dr. Hartman, Columbus, O., for a free catarrh book.

A Dreadful Moment.

A conductor on the Park line had an experience the other day that is quite certain to cause him many uncomfortable minutes in the future. His car stopped at Spruce street to let a middle aged lady on, and as she took her seat the conductor gave the motorman two bells, and the car shot ahead. When the conductor entered the car, the woman in question was looking out of the window and did not see his outstretched hand.

"Fare, please," remarked the conductor.

The woman evidently did not hear him, for she did not turn her head. Neither did she hold out the necessary coin.

"Fare, please," said the conductor in a louder tone.

But the woman paid no heed. Then the conductor touched her on the shoulder and in a tone of voice that rang through the car exclaimed:

"Your fare, please, lady!"

Then the woman turned hastily around and looked at the conductor. The knight of the bellcord gave one gasp and fled to the back platform.

The woman was his mother-in-law.—Omaha World-Herald.

ANECDOTE AND INCIDENT

It is said that Ruth Bryan, daughter of William Jennings Bryan, started to school one morning, not long ago, and, after a desperate run for a street-car, finally succeeded in catching it. As she took her seat she gasped: "Well, I'm glad one of the family can run for something and get it."

The late Henry Russell, the veteran English composer of "Cheer, Boys, Cheer," and of more than 800 other songs which were popular in their day, had many amusing experiences when he sang his ballads on various occasions. Once, after rendering "Woodman, Spare That Tree," a gentleman rose in the gallery, and asked, "Was the tree spared?" On being answered in the affirmative, he, with a sigh of heartfelt relief, exclaimed: "Thank God for that!" After singing the song of "The Dog Carlo," who jumped off an Atlantic liner and saved a child's life, Russell was gravely waited upon by a couple of Yorkshire miners, who begged him for a pup. One of Russell's songs, of which the words were changed in accordance with the altered conditions, is our national anthem, "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."

Ex-President Benjamin Harrison, one of the ablest men who has figured in our public life, has always been handicapped by his unresponsive, cold manner. When he was in the Senate, at Washington, D. C., in the early '80s, he always brought his luncheon to the committee-room. He carried it in his coat-pocket, and would eat it while he went on with his work. One day when he got it out as usual from his pocket, he looked it all over ruefully, for it did look rather flat and dubious. He finally remarked to those near by that he guessed he must have sat on it accidentally. One of his colleagues—one who had recently been ignored by Harrison—spoke up impulsively: "Well, by Jove, Harrison, if you've sat on it, I'll bet you a sixpence it is frozen solid;" and of course a shout went up from the whole committee. Harrison took the joke kindly, and joined in the laugh.

"When I was in Springfield, Abraham Lincoln and General Baker, who was killed at Leesburg, Va., during the Civil War, made the race for the Whig nomination for Congress," says Dr. D. B. Hill. "Both were Whigs, and both were keen for the nomination. Both had a strong personal following, and if both ran the Democrat would win in the district. So a primary election was necessary to settle the contest. Baker won. Both men were at Springfield when the news came. Lincoln was depressed. The crowd, to cheer him up, called on him for a speech. Getting up, he said: "Gentlemen, I'd like to comply with your request, but I can't make a speech now. I expected to receive the nomination, but I failed. If I had won I know Baker would have got up here and so charmed you with his eloquence as to make you believe you had done him a favor by nominating me. But I can't do it.'"

After making out a list of its awards of medals and prizes, one of the juries of the Paris exposition decided to celebrate the completion of its labors by giving an informal little dinner at which the members of the jury, representing many nationalities, could meet far more agreeably as private individuals. Hence, it was decidedly unexpected when, after they had reached the stage of coffee and cigars, the British members of the jury rose with great solemnity and said: "Gentlemen, I propose the health of her Majesty the Queen." This staggered everybody for a moment; but, innate courtesy overcoming national prejudice, they quickly pulled themselves together and drank the toast will all the honors. No sooner, however, had this been accomplished than the American member rose and, poising his glass in the air, said simply, "And other ladies." Needless to say this equally unexpected toast was received with enthusiasm by all.

SAD FATE OF A PRINCESS

Daughter of a Famous Russian Dies in Hungary a Beggar.

A few days ago, writes a Vienna correspondent, an old beggar woman, well known to the police for her drunkenness, was buried by the parish in the suburbs of Buda-Pesth. As she had lived for the last ten years entirely upon charity there were few benevolent persons in that city to whom she was unknown. Clothed in rags as she was, and always cowering at the corner of some street, she still retained traces of her former remarkable beauty. Her story, known to some few persons in Pesth, was a lamentable one. Born as a princess of a well-known Russian house, she began life surrounded by every luxury. She was, however, a true daughter of the South Russian steppes, wild and untamable. Her father, Prince Feodor Goroseskow, served as colonel at the siege of Sebastopol and retired from the army after the Crimean war. He bestowed every care upon the education of his motherless daughter, Princess Ludmilla, who was introduced into St. Petersburg society in 1878.

The same winter at a court ball the young princess unfortunately made the acquaintance of an attache of the Austro-Hungarian embassy, with whom she fell violently in love. To the horror and indignation of her father and her other relations, who then, as now, filled prominent positions in Russia, she eloped with the young man, and, though every search was made for her by her friends, she remained undiscovered. Her father, a man of great wealth, died literally of a broken heart through the misconduct of his daughter.

Three years later the pair of lovers arrived at Buda-Pesth, and as long as their funds held out were seen at the theaters, restaurants and every other place of public resort. When the money which Ludmilla had stolen from her father was exhausted they again disappeared. Driven to the verge of extremity, the young man forged several bills and, upon obtaining the money, fled the country. The princess, deserted and alone, shamed her parentage by joining the legion of adventuresses at Buda-Pesth and fell lower and lower as her beauty gradually faded. After being discharged from the hospital as cured after a long and dangerous illness she found herself entirely without resources and took to begging for a livelihood. Until her death she depended solely upon the charity of the benevolent. Exposure and want shortened her days and she was buried in a common grave without a single attendant mourner.

AGREE TO PRESERVE GAME.

Nations Interested in Africa Have a Compact to Protect Animals.

An act of great importance to all those who are interested in preserving from extermination the wild animals of the world was recently taken by representatives of the various European powers that control territory in Africa, by which the larger portion of that continent becomes, to all intents and purposes a vast game preserve. All game, both great and small, is in danger of disappearing before the persistence of sportsmen and of the gatherers of hides and ivory.

Africa is still rich in animals, birds and fishes, and by placing certain restrictions upon their destruction many species that would otherwise be exterminated may be fostered and perpetuated. In London a convention was signed by the diplomatic representatives of Great Britain, Germany, Spain, Belgium, France, Italy and Portugal for the protection of the wild animals, birds and fishes of Africa, which convention, after being ratified by the powers, is to remain in force for fifteen years. By thus acting in concert the European nations who are most interested in Africa, through their extensive colonial possessions, have formed themselves into a powerful game protective association, with jurisdiction over the most extensive game preserve in the world.

The area over which the provisions of the convention are to apply includes all that portion of the dark continent extending from the twentieth parallel of north latitude to the southern line of the German possessions in southwestern Africa, and from the Atlantic Ocean to the Indian Ocean and the Red Sea.

Under the terms of the convention the hunting and destruction of vultures, secretary birds, owls, giraffes, gorillas, chimpanzees, mountain zebras, wild asses, white-tailed gnus, elands and the little Liberian hippopotamus is prohibited. The young of certain animals, including the elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, zebra, antelope, gazelle, ibex and chevrotain, are protected, and also the same species when accompanied by their young.

Particular emphasis is laid on the protection of young elephants, and all elephants' tusks weighing less than twenty pounds are to be confiscated by the Government if the animal was killed after the convention went into effect. A limited number of lions, leopards, hyenas, otters, baboons and other harmless monkeys, large birds of prey, crocodiles, poisonous snakes and pythons may be killed.

When Wolcott Was Governor.

During the late ex-Governor Wolcott's term of office his youngest son, Oliver, was in one of the primary classes of a school. The teacher was one day asking questions of her little pupils, to give them a chance to show what they knew about one thing and another for the entertainment of a lady who was visiting the school, and she finally inquired: "Can any one tell me who is the Governor of Massachusetts?"

No one could tell, not even little Oliver.

The teacher then told every one of the pupils when he got home to ask his father, so as to be ready to tell her the next day. Accordingly, when the class was assembled the following morning, she gave out the question, calling on Oliver to see what he might have to say about it. Oliver answered:

"Pa says he's the Governor. But I don't believe it, 'cause he's always making fun of everythin' so!"—Boston Herald.

AN INTERESTING CASE

PARENTS OF GROWING GIRLS WILL APPRECIATE IT.

The Story Is Told by a Father Who Is Grateful For His Daughter's Recovery.

No. 91 Lincoln Avenue, Cortland, N. Y., was once a house of sorrow and sadness. The daughter of George Loucks, the pride of the household, seemed going into a decline as she reached her early womanhood and her condition caused the greatest anxiety in the family. The happy ending of the matter caused considerable excitement in the neighborhood and, when questioned by a reporter, Mr. Loucks made the following statement:

"About two years ago my daughter, who was then in her sixteenth year, was in bad health. She was pale and thin, without strength or vitality, in fact her condition was that which is generally called all run down. We were, of course, worried about her and employed the best physicians to attend her. They studied her case and although they did everything possible, gave her no relief which was permanent. The late Dr. Angle had first called my attention to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and my wife had heard they were a fine tonic, so we decided to try them for my daughter. We did so and inside of eight weeks the primary cause of her trouble was removed and she showed a decided gain in health, strength and flesh.

"A great many people will buy a medicine and take a few doses. Then if they are not cured they throw it aside as no good, or take it spasmodically. We believe in a fair trial in strict accordance with directions and our faithfulness was rewarded, for she was greatly benefited by them. Her color came to her cheeks and she continued to gain in weight and strength. We have told a great many people about them and have been glad to do so."

CANCER

Sufferers from this horrible malady nearly always inherit it—not necessarily from the parents, but may be from some remote ancestor, for Cancer often runs through several generations. This deadly poison may lay dormant in the blood for years, or until you reach middle life, then the first little sore or ulcer makes its appearance—or a swollen gland in the breast, or some other part of the body, gives the first warning.

To cure Cancer thoroughly and permanently all the poisonous virus must be eliminated from the blood—every vestage of it driven out. This S. S. S. does, and is the only medicine that can reach deep-seated, obstinate blood troubles like this. When all the poison has been forced out of the system the Cancer heals, and the disease never returns.

Cancer begins often in a small way, as the following letter from Mrs. Shirer shows:

A small pimple came on my jaw about an inch below the ear on the left side of my face. It gave me no pain or inconvenience, and I should have forgotten about it had it not begun to inflame and itch; it would bleed a little, then scab over, but would not heal. This continued for some time, when my jaw began to swell, becoming very painful. The Cancer began to eat and spread, until it was as large as a half dollar, when I heard of S. S. S. and determined to give it a fair trial, and it was remarkable what a wonderful effect it had from the very beginning; the sore began to heal and after taking a few bottles it disappeared entirely. This was two years ago; there are still no signs of the Cancer, and my general health continues good.—MRS. R. SHIRER, La Plata, Mo.

THE SWIFT SPECIFIC CO., ATLANTA, GA.

Both Were Surprised.

The third time I changed cars at the Hornellsville Union railroad station and lunched at the little grillroom just up the street the jolly little proprietor recognized me as a regular patron and did his best to entertain me while my special pot of coffee was coming to a boil.

"Notice that fellow who just went out?" he asked, chuckling contentedly to himself.

I hadn't noticed particularly, but I knew it would be disconcerting to admit, so I nodded encouragingly, says a writer in the New York Herald.

"Well," he continued, "that's Jim Smith—Long Jim Smith they call him—conductor of the Erie, and, say, he's laying for me. Greatest practical joker you ever saw. Always getting rigs on me, and I never could get back on him until last week, and then I was about as much surprised as he was.

"I was coming down the street and saw a crowd gathered around some Salvation Army singers. Long Jim was away on the edge of the crowd, standing on his tiptoes so he could see over the heads of the rest. He had his back to me, and, sticking out from under his arm, was a big bag of lemons. I saw my chance, and I sneaked quietly behind him, hauled off and gave that bag of lemons an awful swipe with my cane."

Here the little man went off into an uncontrollable fit of laughter over the remembrance.

He laughed till his sides shook and tears ran down his face. I waited till he had quieted down.

"Well?" I queried. "Scattered the lemons all about, I suppose?"

"Scattered! Ho, ho, ho! He! Hi, hi, hi! He! Hum! Well, I should say so. But they wasn't lemons; they was eggs."

The Pie Eaters.

Pie in New England is served in many queer ways, especially the king of all pies, the royal mince. Not long ago there appeared a sign in the station of staid, crooked and correct Boston—a sign bearing the strange device, "Hot Mince Pie and Ice Cream."

This is a mild combination compared with one that was served in this city at a midnight supper. A Welsh rabbit was being made, and there were some who did not care to eat it on crackers; no toast in the house, for it was the fire's evening out. A mince pie was found lurking in the ice chest and pressed into service. The rabbit was spread over the pie, and both vanished in a short time. Those who ate are still afraid in the dark, for they can imagine that the same things are coming for them again as came during their dreams of that wild, weird night.

A local minister tells a pie story on himself that is a "corker." He is a delicate man, and his wife was down on pie for him and vetoed it for family use. Once he went to a convention in Pittsfield, and a dinner was served at which there were seven kinds of pie. The minister took a "little of each, please," and never enjoyed himself so much in his life.—Baltimore American.

Why Bees Work In Darkness.

Bees go out all day gathering honey and work at night in the hive, building their comb as perfectly as if an electric light shone there all the time. Why do they prefer to work in the dark? is often asked. Every one knows that honey is a liquid with no solid sugar in it. After standing it gradually assumes a crystalline appearance or granulates and ultimately becomes a solid mass.

Honey has been experimentally inclosed in well corked flasks, some of which were kept in perfect darkness, while the others were exposed to the light. The result was that the portion exposed to the light soon crystallized, while that kept in the dark remained unchanged.

Hence we see why the bees are so careful to obscure the glass windows which are placed in their hives. The existence of the young depends on the liquidity of the saccharine food presented to them, and if light were allowed access to this it would in all probability prove fatal to the inmates of the hive.—Weekly Bouquet.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF THE BABY.

An ache in the back and an ache in the arms
All on account of the baby;
A fear and a fright and a thousand alarms,
All on account of the baby;
And bottles and rattles and whistles and rings,
From cellar to attic a clutter of things.
From morning to night and to morning again
More fuss and more fume than an army of men.
And a head that is stupid for lack of its sleep,
And a heart where a flood of anxieties leap—
All on account of the baby.

A joy in the heart and a light in the eyes.
All on account of the baby;
A growing content and a growing surprise,
All on account of the baby;
And patience that conquers a myriad frets,
And a sunshiny song that another begets,
And pureness of soul as a baby is pure,
And sureness of faith as the children are sure,
And a glory of love between husband and wife,
And a saner and happier outlook on life,
All on account of the baby.

A Winsome Widow

CLARE CARRUTH was nearest the door when the carette stopped to let her in. He saw a woman at the step. He did not notice whether she was old or young—fair or ugly. With the natural and unconsidered courtesy of a gentleman he sprang down to help her in—to give her his seat if necessary, for the carette was well-filled. He observed that she was in mourning—nothing more. Indeed, even as he assisted her his attention was distracted by a disturbance on the street. A horse had fallen. Men were trying to lift it. The carette was moving when he placed his foot on the step—swung into his seat.

He opened his afternoon paper—began to read. For a man on whom many women had looked with admiration he was peculiarly indifferent to femininity in general—absurdly modest. Not that he was timid. His record in the Philippines refuted any such supposition as that. But as a boy he had placed woman on a pinnacle, and he had never had the courage to place sacrilegious hands upon her and pull her down to what he would have considered his own lower level. This may have accounted for the reserve which his friends had in vain endeavored to make him break. Anyhow, his heart had never beaten the faster for the sight of any face until a sudden lurch at Adams street sent the carette careening, jerked his paper down, and left him looking into the loveliest—the most mystical eyes he had ever beheld!

A young widow—assuredly a young widow! The costume left no doubt of that. The enveloping black gown—the small pointed bonnet of crape—the backward-flung veil! And the face these framed was one of such angelic gentleness—such exquisite spirituality. A mere child! And to be left alone in the world—all the chivalrous soul of the man rose in Quixotic revolt.

But—there was nothing to say. Nothing to do, save to recover the fallen paper, to glance over it furtively—to wonder, and—alas! what else?

Carruth didn't know. He had never been guilty of the vulgarity of a street car flirtation. And even had he been there was something in the absolute if indefinable refinement of the face opposite him which would have awed—withheld him.

Only—when she left the carette at the corner of Canal and Adams street—he left also. It was about time, he told himself, that he should go out to the southern suburb and see the Benners. They had been nice to him. And he was neglecting Besnard shamefully! He did not distinctly recollect when the trains ran—it was so long since he had been out there. He could find out, though. Besnard Benner was a rattling good fellow, and——

And just then he saw Besnard Benner taking off his hat with a reverential obeisance to the lady in mourning ahead of him—noticed their brief and smiling conversation. He hurried—when had easy-going Clare Carruth hurried before? He fairly bumped into Benner. It took the latter weeks to understand why his onslaught was so abrupt—his greeting so effusive.

"Just on my way out to your place, old boy! Haven't seen you for an age! How is Mrs. Benner? And the babies? Well? That's good! Hope I don't intrude!"

"Not a bit. Well met. Pot luck, you know. Come along!"

Carruth went along. But it was not until after Mrs. Benner had received him with a cordiality which she affected and a surprise which she concealed—not indeed until—dinner over—he and Benner were having a quiet smoke that he summoned up pluck to ask about the lady to whom his friend had bowed and spoken on the sidewalk at the Union Depot.

"She—er—she was in black—in deep mourning. She was a—a young widow!"

"A widow!" Benner wiggled with delight. "O, Lord! This is too good to keep! If only the press boys get hold of it. A widow!"

"Well, she was dressed like one!" His tone was a bit sulky.

"She was—bless your innocent soul she was! She is every night in the week—not every day, though. To-day was an exception, as she was explaining when you came tearing along. A widow! O, Lord!"

Then he howled again until his wife came in entreating he should not wake the baby.

During the week that followed Carruth made himself what Benner picturesquely called "a brass-knuckled nuisance." There came a day when this patient suburban friend rose in his wrath and despair.

"Come along!" he cried. "She's at home this afternoon—and if you bother me any more—me, a contented and placid married man—about your fascinating young widows—I'll break your head, I will!"

Then—the interval doesn't matter—Carruth found himself in a room where there was a rosy light, and a lot of flowers, and the tinkle of a distant mandolin, and the smell of Ceylon, and a hum of conversation. And he was bowing to a girl in a white gown—the most demure kind of a white gown—a girl with a lot of forget-me-nots at her bosom and never a ring on her lovely hands.

He looked closely to be sure of the latter fact when he saw that the amused eyes bent on him were those of the young widow of the carette.

"How good you were to me the other day!" said the famous young actress. "I was in such a rush out of town I had no time to change the stage costume I wear in the last act of "A Broken Butterfly." The creaking old carette seemed for once better than waiting for a cab. The Benners are old friends of mine—and Besnard tells me you thought me a widow!" Her happy laugh rang out with joyous spontaneity. "Is it to my supposed bereavement I am to credit your courtesy?"

What Clare Carruth's lips said was one thing. What his eyes said was another—and his heart——

Talking of hearts, they do say that of the stage beauty has been finally captured—and by the soldier-financier from the Philippines.

But then people say so many silly things! Only——

For Bachelor Girls.

Some excellent advice to bachelor girls is given by a writer in the Pittsburg Press.

"Night work does not pay," she says. "I have known many successful women who, at the beginning of their careers, worked eighteen hours a day. This may have seemed necessary, but it was not wise, although the persistence and energy which it revealed were admirable.

"The most profitable indulgence possible is that given to good, wholesome recreation, which not only improves the quality of one's effort but also extends the time in which to win success, the active period of a woman's life. Reading should form a considerable element in a young woman's recreation. On this point I speak with conviction from my own personal experience. I can recall scarcely a day in the course of which I have not spent from one to two hours or more reading something substantial—history, poetry, political economy, or historical romance. Not only have I found this one of the rarest pleasures of my life, but it has, to a very considerable extent made up for the lack of a college education. Study in season and out of season. Never stop half-way along any line. Master it or keep at it until forced to admit it has mastered you. Never forget or overlook an old friend, and make as many new ones as possible without the sacrifice of a whit of self-respect or individuality. Do this from principle, inasmuch as it is through our friends that the best opportunities of life come to us."

Just as Good.

A teacher who looks after a class of small girls in an uptown Sunday school called upon one of her charges last Sunday to read the first half of the seventh chapter of the book of Ezra. This is what she heard: "Now after these things in the reign of Smith, King of Persia, Ezra, the son of Jones, the son of Smith, the son of——"

"Stop," cried the teacher, "where are you reading?"

"The first verse," replied the child.

The teacher, much astonished, looked at the place and there read: "Now after these things in the reign of Artaxerxes, King of Persia, Ezra, the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah."

"Why, there is nothing there about Smith or Jones," she said.

"I know there isn't," replied the child. "But when I'm reading to my grandmother and I come to a place like this she says, 'Oh, just say the son of Jones and the son of Smith.'"—New York Evening Sun.

Ridicule is a blow from the fist, wit the prick of a needle, irony the sting of a bee and humor the plaster which heals all these wounds.

DECADENCE OF FALSE PRIDE.

Fashionable to Accept Poverty Frankly and Cheerfully.

Happily nowadays it is no longer the fashion to conceal poverty as if it were a crime. The general keeping up of appearances, which the impoverished aristocracy used to deem necessary to maintain their proper position in the world, is quite out of date in Vanity Fair, and society people with the frankness that is one of their modern characteristics make no attempt whatever to hide their misfortunes from their friends, nor do they deem it necessary to drop out of their world because they are impecunious. Neither does their world "drop" them, as so many people think the rich are apt to do. If there is any "dropping" it is on the side of those who have lost their money and become in consequence morbid and suspicious.

But what is expected of the poorer members of society is a good appearance and cheerful countenance. If they dress well and are happy they can drive in their friends' coaches, eat of their dinners and sail in their yachts as much as ever, but they must make up their minds to put hypersensitiveness aside, and to frankly avow the situation. It is not only in far better taste to make no false pretenses, but it is also better policy. The pride which pretends is not only vulgar, but often has hurtful consequences.

Not long ago the daughter of a man who had experienced considerable financial reverses went on a visit to some friends, and with the silly boastfulness of youth talked largely of the horses and carriages at home which, as it happened, were only kept by her father for a sale which was scheduled for a few weeks later. This, however, she did not mention and the father of her friend, who was a large creditor, naturally supposed that, in spite of the debt, Mr. A—— was still living in the same expensive style as before, and in consequence refused his consent to an arrangement which would have helped the poor harassed man out of his difficulties. These things happen oftener than the members of extravagant families realize, and go to show how foolish it is to have any false pride about one's circumstances.

QUEER FANCIES IN FOOD.

Odd Dishes that Are Placed Before Guests at Fashionable Functions.

Odd food fancies are met at nearly every house. I know a hostess who uses rock candy for sweetening in her afternoon tea and maraschino cherries for flavor, one to each cup. Nobody else brews such delicious tea, her friends declare, and they never seem to understand why. The rock candy comes in neat packages of crystal, which are dipped up by an antique sugar spoon.

Another young hostess made a specialty of cake and beverages in which she could serve whipped cream. She was under salary from the proprietors of flavoring extracts, which they were continually booming, and was supplied with the material, which she demonstrated in her refreshments every afternoon. She was a popular girl and had instituted a tea hour before she became an advertising agent. She was devoted to cooking, and therein lay her value to her employers. She began with vanilla, made cakes flavored with it, and put it in her tea. It adds a most fascinating flavor to the favorite feminine beverage. Then she added chocolate to her tea outfit and used whipped cream.

The next day she changed to lemon flavoring, then to almond and orange, and created such a degree of interest through her afternoons that questions began to be poured over her. There was her chance to speak a good word for the makers of the flavors, and she used it in such a clever way that their popularity was established without anybody suspecting her interest in it. You can readily see how valuable an assistant she was.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

One Doubtful Point.

In France the question of employing swallows instead of pigeons to carry despatches is being seriously considered. The aptitude of the swallow for the work is by many held to be even greater than that of the pigeon. They fly to a greater height, and are therefore less exposed to being shot, and they travel faster, making good nearly eighty miles an hour where a pigeon would only get over fifty. It is also claimed for them that they are more faithful, intelligent and have not on long journeys to stop to feed, as the pigeon has. It is also asserted that the swallow can be more easily and quickly trained. The only doubtful point seems to be whether, on regaining their liberty, they would not yield to their migratory instincts and their desire to seek warmer climes.

Voluminous.

In far Egypt, in the olden days when all writing was upon stone, a young maiden was observed sadly ordering an enormous monolith brought to her home from the quarry.

"Her heart is doubtless broken, and she needs some extra pages for her diary!" the neighbors acutely reasoned, one with another.

For the young person is substantially the young person ever.—Detroit Journal.

SOUTH AMERICAN CATTLE.

Their Growers Threaten Our Supremacy as Beef Purveyors to the World.

There are those who fear that South America is destined to supersede the United States as the great provider of beef for the world. Each year South America increases in importance as rival to the United States as a producer of beef. There are now in the Argentine, Paraguay and Uruguay fully 30,000,000 cattle; in the United States 44,000,000. While the cattle ranges of the United States are becoming more and more restricted each year, there are in the three South American countries named vast regions suitable for cattle raising which have not as yet been utilized. In Texas now the cattle no longer roam over vast ranges, but are practically kept in pastures, the grazing grounds being inclosed in miles upon miles of wire fences. The old-time cowboy, too, has become largely a "fence rider," patrolling the outside of the inclosures to see that the fences are not broken down and that the cattle are not lost, strayed or stolen. Many cowboys are said to have gone to South America, where they have taken up their old free life alongside of the native gauchos on the windswept pampas.

In Paraguay a large region called the Chaco has just been opened up to stock raising. It lies in the northwest corner of Paraguay, between the Paraguay river, a navigable stream, the Pilcomayo river and the Bolivian boundary. The climate is healthful, and though it is warm there in summer, it is never as hot as it was in New York last summer.

The prairies are clothed with a variety of good grasses, and the Chaco lands are acknowledged to be the best fattening grounds in all Paraguay. Good land can be bought in the Chaco for $1,000 a league, and one league will support 1,000 cattle, and two herds of 1,000 each can be fattened on it in a year. All the expenses of raising cattle there are ridiculously small compared with the expense in the United States. A man can put steers on the range in Paraguay, all expenses paid, at a cost of $8.50 a head, and these he can sell when fattened for $12.50 a head. Experienced cattle men in the Chaco have cleared as much as $8,000 the first year on an expenditure of $10,500. They put in $1,000 for land, $8,500 for cattle, and $1,000 for labor and other expenses. Living and labor in Paraguay cost about one-eighth as much as they do in the United States. The gauchos are paid $3 a month in the Chaco. In the United States the cowboy's wages used to be $30 a month. The gaucho's food, which is supplied to him, costs about $3 a month. Cowboys are furnished with food costing $10 a month.

The cattle of northern Paraguay are similar to the Texas cattle, being of fully as good stock and much tamer and more easily managed. Though there are now in northern Paraguay only enough cattle for a small beef industry, their numbers are rapidly increasing, and in three or four years this region bids fair to be the center of a great beef industry.

As yet these South American regions have not the facilities for transportation which the cattle districts of the United States possess, but it is only a question of time when they will have them, and then can the United States hold its own in the export of beef?

WINDSOR CASTLE.

The Favorite Seat of the Sovereigns of Great Britain.

Windsor Castle, one of the homes of the late Queen Victoria and which descends to her son and successor, Edward VII., has for many years been the favorite seat of the sovereigns of Great Britain and is one of the largest and most magnificent royal palaces on earth.

The original estate of Windsor belonged to the monks of Westminster and was purchased from them by William the Conqueror, who erected a castle upon it. This castle was later torn down and a new one was erected by King Edward III. Various additions were made to this, the final touches being given under Queen Victoria, who expended $4,500,000 in its embellishment and enlargement. The interior of the castle is richly and profusely decorated and filled with works of painters, sculptors and other artists, whose name is world-wide. The Albert chapel the Queen had fitted up as a memorial to the late Prince Consort. In another chapel—St. George's—rest the remains of seven of England's Kings, among them Henry VIII. and William IV., the uncle and predecessor of Queen Victoria. In early times the Saxon Kings resided on the site of the present castle.

A Female Electrician.

Mrs. Ayrton, who is well known for her researches in the field of electricity, had the honor the other evening of dining with the 360 members and guests of the Institution of Electrical Engineers at the Hotel Cecil, in London. Her presence brought up the novel question how she should be recognized by the speakers at the dinner. The earlier speakers said, "My lords, lady, and gentlemen," which sounded odd. The Lord Chief Justice improved on this with "My lords, Mrs. Ayrton, and gentlemen," while Sir John Wolfe Barry struck out the formula, "My lords, madam, and gentlemen." Mrs. Ayrton some time ago justified her election to membership by a thoroughly scientific essay, "On the Hissing of the Electric Arc," a subject which she still further investigated, and on which she read a paper, in completion of her inquiry, at the recent meeting of the institution in Paris.

A man who has been earning $200 a month, and who is suddenly reduced to $50, is a dandy if he can decrease the number of delivery wagons that stop at his house.

Old love affairs are so wretched and humiliating that, really, new lovers should not be jealous of them.

FOR THE YOUNG FOLKS

School-Days in the Old Times.

Boys and girls of the present day find the road to learning a much smoother and pleasanter pathway than did their forefathers. A hundred years ago the favorite text in almost every family was "Spare the rod and spoil the child."

A rawhide or bunch of birch hung over the mantel-shelf in many houses, to be used upon the boys of the family, the usual rule being that a whipping at school must be followed by one at home. Those given at school were usually the more severe. In many old schools in England the "birch horse" is preserved as a curiosity; a high wooden frame shaped like a saddle, on which the delinquent was strapped to receive his lashes.

Watson, in his "Annals of Philadelphia," tells us that girls as well as boys were whipped in the "academies for the children of the gentry" a hundred years ago.

Other punishments than whipping were common. Talking in school was sometimes punished by fastening a frame over the mouth, from which lolled a huge red flannel tongue. Almost every school had its dunce's cap, and some of them had a "clog," which was a block of wood that was strapped to the leg of a truant and worn outside of school.

Dull scholars were often made to stand open-mouthed under the clock, to be pointed at by their comrades as they marched past. In certain English schools a large wicker cage is preserved in which the delinquent was fastened, the cage being then drawn by a pulley to the ceiling, where it remained until the ill-doer was supposed to be sufficiently punished.

The tardy scholar was sometimes forced to march through the streets preceded by an usher who carried a lighted lantern, to the amusement of the jeering crowd.

These punishments seem barbarous, and were barbarous when applied to most school delinquents, but there are some natures, almost or quite devoid of moral sensibility—gross mentally and physically—that can only be made to see their wrong-doing by severe corporal punishment. They are like animals. Their comprehension of guilt is only vitalized and measured by the acuteness of the pain inflicted as a penalty.—Youth's Companion.

there may be produced different shadows, smiling or cross-looking, with noses, chin and lips short or long, as the performer may choose.

Grandpa's Glasses.

My grandpa has to wear glasses,
'Cause his eyesight is not very strong,
And he calls them his "specs," and he's worn them
For ever and ever so long.
And when he gets through with his reading
He carefully puts them away,
And that's why I have to help find them
'Bout seventy-five times a day.
But at night when we sit round the table,
And papa and mamma are there,
He reads just as long as he's able,
And then falls asleep in his chair.
And he sits there and sleeps in his glasses
And you don't know how funny it seems;
But he says he just has to wear them
To see things well in his dreams.
—Ladies' Home Journal.

Big Palace of a Little King.

The boy King of Spain, Alfonso XIII., who is the smallest King in the world, lives in one of the biggest palaces ever built. It takes visitors two days to go through it. In its vast courtyard there is room for a considerable army to maneuver. The youthful monarch is said to have no affection for his enormous and somewhat gloomy residence, and to have expressed decided intentions of making radical alterations when he grows up. However, there is plenty of time for him to change his mind before he will have attained the authority to reconstruct anything more extensive than the quarters for his toy soldiers.

What Birds Say.

The call of the yellow hammer is "Pee!" and his answer, "Zee-zee!" The field lark calls, "Pippee!" and replies, "Preeoo, preeoo, pee, preeoo!" The wood lark says, "Badoo-lay, badoo-lay!" and replies, "Lu-lu-lu-lu!" The tomtit says, "Titigu, titigu!" and replies, "Steetee, steetee!" The redbreast says, "Weep, weep!" and replies, "Teeree, teereetee, teereeteeree!" The wren, "Zool, zool!" and answers "Zalp!" Th black capped warbler says "Toc!" The white-throated warbler says "Bshee, bshee!" They both reply "Clap!" Many birds have only one cry for calling and answering. The wagtail says, "Teetroo, teetroo!" the white tail, "Farfar!" the sparrow, "Twhee, twhee!" like the bullfinch. The cuckoo repeats its own name, "Cuckoo, cuckoo!" The quail, a bird of good council, says "Pay thy debts, pay thy debts!" The own, when evening comes, saddens the woods with his dismal cry, in regular time, like the ticking of a clock: "Hoot-toot, hoot-toot!" The nightingale says "Teeo-teeo, teeo-teeo!" and the thrush, Zeep-zeep!"

Facts About Cows.

It was a class of 8-year-olds, and the subject for composition was "The Cow." One of the girls wrote, among other things, "The cow is a very useful animal, for she supplies us with beefsteaks, veal, pork and other meats." Another, looking at the subject from a wholly different standpoint, thought the cow very useful because "She keeps the garden clean by eating the weeds."

IS DANCING A PAST FANCY?

A Chicago Master Who Thinks the Amusement Is Reaching Its End.

One of the well-known ballet trainers of the city, in discussing the subject one day last week, said: "People will not dance at all within a very few years. You see, dancing is not meant to be distorted as it now is. To dance once must be graceful, but to dance after the prevailing ballroom fashion one must be very angular. In the first place, there is nothing to dance. People no longer waltz, and when they do waltz they do not waltz well; it is a kind of awkward whirling around, with no opportunity or design for a graceful movement. All that was graceful about the waltz of the past has been taken from it to please the hopper, who would prefer to whirl around on one toe, with no thought of dancing. How can one expect that it would be any different with this two-step turning every one's head? No one can think to dance well when all he dances from one month's end to another is the two-step. There is nothing graceful about that. You can't get any kind of training out of it. It is no dance. Did you ever analyze it?"

The master began to dance, turning from the evolutions of the old-fashioned dances to the waltz and the two-step. With his hands on his hips he glided back and forth, all the while smiling cynically.

"Can't you see how very foolish it is?" he said. "Can't you see there is nothing to this wonderful two-step? One doesn't have to dance—just take so many glides, turn, glide again and again turn. Where is your opportunity for grace? Where is your opportunity for skill? Every man, woman and child in the country could do this if he wanted. Our only good fortune is that they do not want to."

"But what difference does it make that the two-step is, as you say, a dance any one can do? Does a thing need to be difficult in order to be popular?" some one asked him.

"That is the secret of the whole thing—it does have to be just that. No one wants to dance something every living creature can dance, and if they do they ought not to, for it is a bad thing for our profession. I can't see what the society masters live on with this kind of thing going on, and you know they do protest. They tried to find some way out of the difficulty last summer."—Chicago Chronicle.

Knew All About Clipping.

M. J. Keefe and Rud Dietrich, who operate a newspaper bureau in the Johnston Building, recently conceived the idea of advertising for help, and Keefe sat down and wrote the following ad, which he exhibited with great pride to his partner:

Young Men—Six expert at clipping.

The ad was inserted in the papers, and the next morning when Keefe came to his office door he met about thirty young men who were odorous with hair oil and pomade. They entered with a rush as he opened the door, and a half hour later his partner, Dietrich, forced his way through the crowd to the inner office, where he found Keefe sitting in a chair dismayed.

"We're in bad on the ad!" moaned Keefe.

"How's that?" asked Dietrich.

"They're not newspaper clippers," said Keefe, pointing at the outer office with a groan. "They're barbers!"—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Disproportionate.

Short Stories prints an anecdote of a Western judge who, although he is wise, does not mind being witty.

While he was trying a case recently he was disturbed by a young man who kept moving about in the rear of the court-room, lifting chairs and looking under things.

"Young man," the Judge said, at length, "you are making a great deal of noise."

"Your honor," replied the young man, "I have lost my overcoat and I am trying to find it."

"Well," said the venerable jurist, "people often lose whole suits in here without making all that disturbance."

Love and philosophy are sworn enemies.

FARM AND GARDEN

FINE CAULIFLOWER.

Extra Fine Heads—Hints For Growing First Class Specimens.

A correspondent who has made something of a specialty in growing cauliflower sends to American Gardening a photograph of some heads grown last season when the weather was unfavorable, hot and dry, at the particular time in the growth of the plants when moisture and a cool atmosphere are necessary for producing a nice, solid head. The growth of the plants was rank and leafy, and, although they did not head up early, they did so rapidly and uniformly as soon as they began. There was scarcely a variation in the whole patch. They were solid, heavy, snow white.

In this connection some points on the growing of fine cauliflower for exhibition are quoted from the journal mentioned:

When the heads begin to form, some quick acting manure, such as nitrate of soda in a liquid form, will be of material assistance. When they attain some size, shading from sunshine is necessary to prevent the heads from getting yellowish in color. This is easiest done by bending a few of the outer leaves inward over the head; just crack the midrib and the leaf will stay in position without flagging or withering.

Should they mature a day or two ahead of time, it is better to pull them up and store in a cool, dark cellar, inserting the roots in moist soil to prevent wilting, as if left to grow out of doors they soon get past their best. In any case, if cut the night before they are needed and the cut ends inserted in water, the heads will keep fresh for a much longer period. Don't cut too short or take off many of the leaves, though it is often necessary to dress a few of the inner ones to show the head to its best advantage.

A Neat Nesting Arrangement.

The cut from The Farm Journal shows a very convenient nesting arrangement for a poultry house. The long box with sloping top is built against one side of the pen, about 18 inches from the floor. The hen enters by the dark alley at the rear and enters one of the darkened nests, the darkness hindering egg eating. The long cover can be raised for securing the eggs. The front can be hinged to let down, thus making it easy to sweep out the nests to keep them clean.

Will Camphor Pay In Florida?

The camphor laurel or camphor tree of commerce is one of the best trees to grow in Florida, according to an Orlando grower, who writes to The Farm, Field and Fireside that it has never been seriously injured by cold weather. He says:

I have several trees 12 years old now 40 feet high and 14 to 18 inches in diameter one foot above the ground. The growing of camphor trees in groves is now becoming a good business. Thousands of trees are being planted every year. The present process of cutting off part of the top of the trees at a time and distilling the leaves and twigs does not in the least injure the tree. When the trees are 3 years old, the grower takes off about one-third of the leaves and twigs. This is done three or four times a year. New growth soon appears and fills the space taken off.

Three-year-old trees will produce about one pound of camphor per year and when 15 or 20 years old will produce three to four pounds. The usual custom is to plant about 300 trees per acre, and as land is cheap and trees are worth about $35 per 1,000 (1 year old) it costs but little to make a paying camphor plantation. The cost of labor cuts but a small figure in the production of camphor, and when the question of manufacture and duty of custom house is added to the imported article it can readily be seen that camphor can be made to pay in Florida.

Blighted Celery Not Worthless.

It is a mistake to suppose that blighted celery is not worth putting in for winter use, judging by the following experience with badly blighted crops related in American Agriculturist: About the 1st of October I trim up the plants, leaving only the heart leaves. A shallow trench in the cellar is well watered, and the roots, with as much soil as can be conveniently left on, are placed in the trench; more water is given and sand or other light and dry soil is worked carefully in and about the plants, leaving only the tips exposed. Finer celery I have never had than such roots furnished in January or February. If the long white brittle stalks are cut off squarely—not too close—a second crop has been ready by April. This is lighter, of course, than the other, but a dainty luxury for the season.

It is recommended that there should be a regular hour for feeding poultry. It is wonderful how quickly the fowls will know when the time arrives. This is especially so with ducks.

Work on the California terminal of the San Pedro, Los Angeles and Salt Lake Railroad is progressing. The widening of the roadbed between Los Angeles and San Pedro, which began about ten days ago, will require from thirty to forty days, so the laying of the new heavy rails will not be begun for nearly a month. The rails are now on the way. The present rails are only of fifty-six pounds weight. The ties are on the ground and everything is being moved forward as fast as possible. The surveying of the route has been completed from Los Angeles to San Bernardino, and the officials of the company intend to begin the surveying of the route from Salt Lake City westward immediately. A party of engineers is said to be preparing for the actual commencement of their duties in a few days.—Call.

U. S. AMENDMENT TO MINING LAWS.

The Senate committee on mines and mining, to whom was referred the bill to amend the mining laws of the United States, have reported it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. They argue that the intent and meaning of the mining laws have been wholly disregarded in locating placer mining claims in Alaska and in the attempted location of oil lands in California. In Alaska single individuals, by means of powers of attorney and other devices, monopolize vast tracts of mineral lands upon which no labor is performed, thus greatly retarding development of the country and depriving bona fide miners of the opportunity to explore and develop mines and obtain title. The bill reported by the committee repeals all laws allowing one person to locate for another, and requires $100 worth of development work upon each location within a year from the date thereof, and on all claims heretofore located it requires the development work to be done before the 1st day of October, 1901, and in every year thereafter.

In California a few persons have attempted to locate hundreds of thousands of acres of petroleum or oil lands under the placer mining laws; and petroleum discoveries have only been made or attempted on a very small percentage of these claims. The existing placer mining laws, which the courts and general land office hold to require an actual discovery of mineral or petroleum as the very basis of a placer mining location, are not adapted to the acquisition of petroleum lands, owing to the fact that petroleum, unlike placer gold, is rarely found upon or near the surface, and can only be discovered by expensive drilling operations. Hence these laws do not apply or give rights to the prospector prior to an actual discovery of mineral or oil, his claim is subject to exploration by any rival claimant, and the first to discover mineral or oil will acquire the better title, regardless of the priority of attempted locations. It is therefore clear that lands supposed to be valuable for oil, but upon which no oil has been discovered, are open to acquisition under the agricultural land laws; but these laws are not adequate to meet the situation, as such scrip, land warrants, and forest-reserve lands, with which the supposed oil lands may be acquired, are limited in quantity and held by private parties, and therefore not readily obtainable. In view of these considerations, the committee believes that the placer mining laws are not applicable to lands supposed or believed to contain petroleum, but upon which no discoveries have been made. The practice using those laws to monopolize large areas of land, without title and without assurance of protection to those exploring and investing therein, does not operate to retard rather than to advance the development of the oil resources of the country, and leads to strife and contention. The committee believes that an opportunity should be given to purchase from the Government such lands, in limited quantities, to those who make affidavit that the same is believed to be valuable for petroleum. The bill which the committee presented is intended to permit this without interfering with the right to acquire under the placer mining laws lands upon which oil discoveries have actually been made, as it is only to such lands that the existing law is applicable. The committee's bill gives the privilege of purchasing lands which are believed to be not known to contain oil, in tracts of from 10 to 160 acres, at $2 50 per acre.—Min. and Sci. Press.

Shooting at Ballarat

A dispatch to S. F. Chronicle on March 31, from San Bernardino says: News has been received here of a probably fatal quarrel between two employes of the Consolidated Gold Mining Company of Ballarat. Albert Phelps and Jack McCauley were playing a game of poker in company with eight other miners when a dispute arose as to which of them should deal the cards. The players decided in favor of McCauley. This provoked Phelps and he challenged McCauley to fight. Upon his refusal, Phelps took from his pocket a pistol and shot McCauley in the left side. The bullet carried a piece of cloth into his body and blood poisoning will develop.

Phelps has not been arrested. The wounded man says he does not wish to prosecute. Both Phelps and McCauley have been intimate friends for years and were members of the Oklahoma contingent of Roosevelt's Rough Riders in the Cuban campaign.

Petaluma, California's chicken center, has produced a great many fine specimens of the freak variety in chicken life, but it remained for William Brady of Wilson district to produce the prize winners. Brady found among the eggs he gathered several weeks ago one of extraordinary size. He put this in with a "setting" in an incubator, and yesterday it hatched. Brady was surprised to see emerging from the broken shell two lusty chicks. The big egg had sheltered a fine specimen of twins. The only difference in the process of incubation of the twin egg and the others of the "setting" was that the freak took a longer period to hatch. Of the twin chickens one is black and the other white. They are healthy and well formed and among the best of the hatch.—Call.

WOMEN OF THE UNITED STATES

Regard Peruna as Their Shield Against Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Grip and Catarrhal Diseases.

Mrs. Belva A. Lockwood, Late Candidate for the Presidency.

Mrs. Belva Lockwood, the eminent barrister, of Washington, D. C., is the only woman who has ever been a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. She is the best known woman in America. As the pioneer of her sex in the legal profession she has gathered fame and fortune. In a letter to The Peruna Medicine Co., she says:

"I have used your Peruna both for myself and my mother, Mrs. Hanna J. Bennett, now in her 88th year, and I find it an invaluable remedy for cold, catarrh, hay fever and kindred diseases; also a good tonic for feeble and old people, or those run down, and with nerves unstrung."

Yours truly,
Belva A. Lockwood.

Peruna cures catarrh by removing the cause, inflamed mucous membranes.

Dr. Hartman, the compounder of Peruna, once said, in a lecture to women: "A great number of women consult me every year. I often have occasion to say to these patients: 'I fear you have catarrh, madam.' They will generally reply, 'Oh, no, I never had catarrh. My nose is perfectly clear, and my breath is not bad. I am not troubled with coughing or spitting, or any other disagreeable symptoms of catarrh.' 'But, my dear madam, you may have catarrh all the same. Catarrh is not always located in the head. You may have catarrh of the lungs, or stomach, or liver, or kidneys, and especially you may have catarrh of the pelvic organs.'"

Mrs. T. J. Ballard, Eureka Springs, Ark., cured of a severe case of catarrh by Peruna.

The Doctor went on to say: "I have been preaching this doctrine for the last forty years, but there are a vast multitude of women who have never heard it yet. Catarrh may attack any organ of the body. Women are especially liable to catarrh of the pelvic organs. There are one hundred cases of catarrh of the pelvic organs to one of catarrh of the head. Most people think, because they have not catarrh of the head, they have not catarrh at all. This is a great mistake, and is the cause of many cases of sickness and death."

Mrs. T. Pelton, 562 St. Anthony avenue, St. Paul, Minn., writes: "Peruna has done wonders for me. It has cured my headache and palpitation of the heart; has built up my whole system. I cheerfully recommend Peruna to all sufferers afflicted with catarrh. My mother is never without Peruna. When one is tired and generally out of sorts, if Peruna is taken it immediately removes that tired feeling."

Mrs. T. Pelton.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

Address Dr. Hartman, President of The Hartman Sanitarium, Columbus, O.

The Abused Mule.

The wickedness of mules is a standing joke, and you are always hearing them abused. Ever see a team of mules run away? Almost every day you see a family horse running away, usually with screaming women and children in the buggy, but did you ever see a mule run away? Did you ever personally know a mule to kick any one? The fact is, the mule works hard on light feed and gets nothing but abuse.—Atchison Globe.

Competent, but Uncanny.

A. A. Gallagher, district passenger agent of the Missouri Pacific railroad, while en route south was taken quite ill and was compelled to stop at Montgomery, Ala. He went to a hotel and sent for a physician.

The medical man said:

"You have a case of pneumonia and must have a nurse."

"All right," said Gallagher. "Do you know a good nurse you can send to look after me?"

The doctor said he did and would have the nurse at the hotel within an hour. In about an hour a colored woman who measured about nine feet in girth put in an appearance, and Gallagher asked her if she had ever nursed sick people.

"Yes, indeed," she replied. "I'ze had considerable sperience with ailing pussons. I nussed Marster John, and he died; then I nussed Mistress Lucy, and she died; then I nussed Mistress Lucy's sister. The doctor didn't think she was so very poorly, but she done died."

"Have you had any other experience in nursing?" asked Gallagher.

"Yes, indeed. Only last week I left Colonel Carter's house, where I nussed the colonel for five days."

"Well, did the colonel get well?" asked Gallagher.

"No. The colonel he died, too, but Dr. Jones, who 'tended him, run a big knife into the colonel and opened him up. The doctor had been out late the night before and was a little nervous. The knife sort of slipped and just about cut the colonel's heart out. Then the doctor said all h— couldn't save him."

"You seem to be a good nurse," said Gallagher, "and you're engaged."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Not So Far Gone.

The last letter he received from wifey conveyed the intelligence that she was quite sick, and of course he was considerably worried. But he was comforted by the fact that she was with her mother. He wrote her an affectionate letter and told her to be sure and let him know if she grew worse. The next letter conveyed the intelligence that she was a little worse, though the doctor said it was nothing serious. But he worried a great deal.

The next afternoon a telegraph boy sauntered into his office with the usual nonchalance of a messenger boy conveying a "rush" message and shoved the book under hubby's nose.

"Is dis Mr. Blank?" asked the boy.

"Yes," gasped hubby, cold chills chasing up and down his spine.

"Message f'r you. Sign here. De charges is 60 cents."

Hubby grabbed the fateful manila envelope and hastily tore it open. What he suffered while tremblingly unfolding the bit of yellow paper can be imagined, but not described. He was almost afraid to read it, but finally he nerved himself for the worst. This is what he read:

"Turn off the water and don't forget to give the bird plenty of seed."—Omaha World-Herald.

PHOTOGRAPHING HORSES.

Little Tricks of the Camera to Get the Best Effects.

"It is no easy matter to make a good horse picture," said Alfred J. Meyer, of Pach Brothers, "although every amateur thinks himself equal to the task. A horse must be taken from the proper point or his owner will not recognize the picture. If the camera is too near the subject certain points will be exaggerated in the photograph. The best results are obtained by placing the horse on a slight incline, so that the fore feet are a trifle higher than the hind feet. This position throws the head up. Then snapping the fingers or making any slight noise will cause the animal to prick up his ears, and at the moment when he is in this position of attention the photographer makes the picture.

"When horses in harness are to be photographed they must be posed on level ground or on a slight incline. To make them look alive a hat or a card is sometimes scaled in front of them, and at the moment when they look up the snap shot is made. When pictures of horses in action are made we usually place the camera near the ground, and by that means we get the best hoof positions, which cannot be secured when the camera is held or placed at the ordinary height. To make pictures of jumping horses the same method is employed, and the height of the jump is sometimes exaggerated by placed the camera below the track level. An excavation is made in the ground for that purpose, and pictures made from there increase the apparent height of hurdles and make a small jump look like something remarkable."—New York Tribune.

BITS FOR BOOKWORMS

Mrs. Humphry Ward is one of the few women who have deliberately prepared themselves for a literary life. She spent eight years in study in the Bodleian Library in Oxford.

Miss Mary Johnston has almost completed her third novel, which, under the title of "Audrey," will begin as a serial. Her second novel, "To Have and To Hold," is in its two hundred and eighteleth thousand.

An authoritative and sympathetic "Life of the Emperor Frederick," father of the present Kaiser, edited from the German of "Margaretha von Poschinger," with an introduction by Sidney Whitman, is to be brought out soon.

James Lane Allen's "The Mettle of Your Pastures," which was announced a year ago and was generally thought to have been finally published under the title of "The Reign of Law," is a distinct novel, which will probably see light some time soon. It has been so far withheld, as, for certain reasons Mr. Allen wished to bring out "The Reign of Law" first.

It is rather strange that the author of "With Hoops of Steel" should be a woman, who, according to the title page, is Florence Finch Kelly. The story itself is thoroughly masculine in its theme and in its treatment. It tells of the plains of the far West, of cattlemen and ranchmen, and of man's friendship for man. In fact, it is just the sort of a story that usually comes from a man. Nevertheless, a woman has written it and written it well.

The books that publishers issue especially for the holiday trade nowadays are usually illustrated editions of new or standard books that are always in demand and that may be expected to sell nearly as well at other times of the year. But people of good taste and culture, according to the testimony of many publishers, are getting more and more to give for Christmas presents fine editions of good books that have no special characteristics to mark them as holiday books.

Unsatisfied.

He mourned his lot
Because he had to win his way,
Because he had to vie with men,
Because no kindly fairies brought
Unearned, unfought-for gifts to lay
In heaps down at his feet, and when
His efforts were rewarded, still
He mourned that those rewards were not
Such as to ever quite fulfill
The glad anticipations he had known!
He marked the blessings that his rival sought
And won—and then thought of his own
And mourned his lot!

He mourned his lot
Because, when Fortune came, at last,
And, smiling sweetly on him, brought
The honor he had craved and men
Perceived his worth, sweet Youth had passed
And left him bent and pale! And when
They went among the monuments and sought
A place for him, and laid him there
Upon a noble knoll—a favored spot
Begirt with flowers, beautiful and rare—
Perchance he looked back at them—I know not—
From some ethereal realm somewhere
And mourned his lot!

Rough on the Old Man.

Senator Lucien Baker tells a good story on himself. When his son had completed his education at Ann Arbor he announced his intention of going into the newspaper business. "Why don't you come into my office and read law?" the Senator asked. "Because, father," the young man replied, "I don't believe an honest man can be a lawyer."

HARD TO BEAR.

Story of a Druggist Who Was Always Compounding Remedies for Others Yet Suffered Agonies Himself.

From the Republican, Eldorado, Ill.

Perhaps in no case where stomach trouble has the ailment has the efficiency of a popular remedy been so thoroughly demonstrated as in the case of W. E. Mathis, a prominent druggist of Eldorado, Ill. The story, as told by Mathis, is as follows:

"In the spring of 1894 I had a very serious case of indigestion. My stomach commenced to give me great trouble, and, while I knew the nature of the pain, I did not at first use the proper precaution. For some time I did not pay any attention, but it gradually grew worse, when I consulted a physician, who prescribed for me. I used his medicine according to instructions. I began to experience nervous spells, became subject to congestion of the stomach, and considered myself in a precarious condition. The physician's medicine and other remedies I tried failed to benefit me.

"One day a friend urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I considered it a useless experiment, but as I had tried everything else, I agreed to take them. That was three and a half years ago. When I had used three boxes I could note very plainly the change for the better. When I had used the seventh box I was cured.

"The pills have not only cured the indigestion, but they have also cured my nervousness, my blood is in perfect condition, and they have brought my weight from 140 pounds at the commencement of the stomach trouble to 180 at present.

"If any one who reads this desires to know more of my experience I will gladly answer letters which enclose stamp for reply.

Signed,
W. E. MATHIS,

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 27th day of June, 1900.

Sword of a Thousand Pieces.

What do you think of a sword blade that contains a thousand sheets of metal? Yet they are not uncommon and, as you will readily imagine, are of oriental workmanship. Our painstaking, patient Japanese friends are the makers of them, and a few days ago I had the pleasure of seeing one in a Fourth avenue curiosity shop and had its method of manufacture explained.

The blades of these sabers are made from magnetic iron ores. The steel is produced in small, very thin sheets, and the workman begins by fixing one of them to the end of an iron rod which serves as a handle. To this are soldered other small sheets until the mass has a length of about eight inches, a width of about two inches and a thickness of a little more than a quarter of an inch.

This bar is brought to a white heat, doubled on itself and hammered until it is down to its original dimensions. This process is repeated 15 times. Four similar bars are then soldered together, doubled upon themselves, resoldered and heated, the operation being repeated five times. This process makes the superposed layers so thin that a saber contains at least a thousand sheets of metal.

If you find one of these swords that has a veined appearance, you may know it is caused by alternate layers of iron and steel being soldered together.—New York Herald.

Great Drawing to a Bobtail Pair.

"The most remarkable draw I ever saw made at poker was in a Chicago club one night," said a Chicago man. "There were five of us in a little social game, with a limit of $25 and all jack pots. A friend of mine whom I will call Jones was dealing. I was first under the guns and passed, as did also the two men sitting next. The fifth man—we will say his name was Brown—opened the pot for $5. Jones didn't have the shadow of a thing in his hands, but he raised Brown $10, intending to stand pat and bluff it out. Brown had three aces, and he came back at Jones with $10 better.

"Now, instead of laying down, as a wise man should in a case like that, Jones determined to see it through. He knew, of course, that it would be useless to try to bluff, so he drew three cards to a king and queen of spades. Brown had drawn two cards to his aces and had got a small pair. As a bait he led off the betting with $5. Jones hadn't looked at his hand until Brown bet, and when he picked up his cards he almost fell dead. He had drawn an ace, jack and ten of spades, making a royal flush. They raised each other back and forth until one or the other had all his money in, and when the hands were shown the game broke up right there."—Washington Post.

The Time to Break the Rule.

There is an anecdote in some volume of French theatrical memoirs narrating an experience of Mlle. Clairon, the great tragic actress, with a pupil of hers, a girl of strong natural gifts for the histrionic art, but far too frequent and too exuberant in her gesticulation. So when the pupil was once to appear before the public in a recitation Mlle. Clairon bound the girl's arms to her side by a stiff thread and sent her thus upon the stage.

With the first strong feeling she had to express the pupil tried to raise her arms, only to be restrained by the thread. A dozen times in the course of her recitation she was prevented from making the gestures she desired until at the very end she could stand it no longer, and in the climax of her emotion she broke her bonds and swung her hands to her head.

When she came off the stage, she went humbly to where Mlle. Clairon was standing in the wings and apologized for having snapped the thread.

"But you did quite right!" said the teacher. "That was the time to make the gesture, not before!"—Brander Matthews in Harper's Magazine.

The Coroner's Two Verdicts.

"Inquests are sometimes very funny affairs," remarked a western man. "I remember one in the early days of my county in Kansas. A man was found dead by the side of a small stream out on the prairie. No mark was found on his well dressed body. His gun was fully loaded in his hip pocket, and $25 was found in his pocketbook. Of course the coroner took charge of the money. A jury was impaneled and after finishing its deliberations found that the man clearly died of heart failure.

The coroner promptly paid from the dead man's pile the $12 due for expenses and discharged the jury. The $13 remaining bothered him. He argued that to turn that $13 over to the county, to be held in trust for the man's possible relatives, would be the same as throwing it away. The man was a stranger in those parts. Possibly he had no friends.

The coroner was equal to the occasion, however. He declared himself dissatisfied with the verdict and called the jury together again. They sat on the body a second time and found exactly the same verdict, but the coroner's mind was at ease. The $25 was exhausted."—Washington Star.

Less Hopeful For Himself.

George, the colored janitor, needed some money and went to the church treasurer for it.

"There isn't a cent in my hands just now, George," said that officer, "and won't be till next Sunday's collections are handed over. Can't you wait till then?"

"Don't see how I kin, Mistah Gubney," persisted George. "K'yarn't run de house widout money."

"The best I can do for you," returned the treasurer, "will be to advance you $3 out of my own pocket and run my risk of getting it back from the church."

"Well, suh," solemnly rejoined the janitor, "ef you don't git it back 'm de chu'ch, Mistah Gubney, you'll git yo' reward in de good world, but it's diffn't wid me. Ef I cain't git dat free dollahs f'm you, I'd like t' know whah I kin!"—Chicago Tribune.

The Trust Problem.

To a thoughtful mind, the trust problem is one of serious import. It must be firmly grappled with, for it creeps into society before you are aware of its existence, in this respect much resembling the various disorders which attack the stomach, such as constipation, indigestion, dyspepsia and biliousness. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will cure all such ailments, and prevent la grippe, malarial fever and ague. Be sure to give it a trial.

When to Select Diamonds.

"It may appear strange to you," said a diamond expert, "but damp, murky weather practically kills the diamond business. No dealer dare buy for fear of cheating himself. The purest white diamond will on one of these dark, foggy days take on a straw shade and to all appearances is off color. Always pick out a diamond on a clear day, but see to it that you have a good light on the gem, for many dealers tint their ceilings and walls a delicate hue, 'which gives the stone a bluish tint which it does not or should not possess in a clear light.'"—Washington Star.

THE FOUR GUESTS.

A knock at the door—but he
Was dreaming a dream of fame;
And the one who knocked drew softly back,
And never again he came.
A knock at the door—as soft—
As soft—as shy—as a dove.
But the dreamer dreamed till the guest was gone—
And the guest was Love.

A knock at the door—again
The dreamer dreamed away
Unheeding—deaf to the gentle call
Of the one who came that day.
A knock at the door—no more
The guest to that door came.
Yet the dreamer dreamed of the one who called—
For the guest was Fame.

A knock at the door—but still
He gave it no reply;
And the waiting guest gave a cheery hail
Ere he slowly wandered by.
A knock at the door—in dreams
The dreamer fain would grope,
Till the guest stole on, with a humbled sigh—
And the guest was Hope.

A knock at the door—'twas loud,
With might in every stroke;
And the dreamer stopped in his dreaming thought,
And suddenly awoke.
A knock at the door—he ran
With the swiftness of a breath;
And the door swung wide, and the guest came in—
And the guest was Death.

AFTER 12 MIDNIGHT

I.

THE man who speaks loudly in public places of the valuables of his sideboard and the insecurity of his front door may safely be put down as an amiable idiot. Yet Thomas Nedham of the firm of Nedham & Wilkins was no fool. He was reputed to be a cute man of business, who knew how to keep his counsel when his money was at stake, and yet here he was to-night, on the front seat of a crowded omnibus, boasting to his neighbor that his silver-plate was the heaviest in all Hampstead.

"Burglars?" he laughed, in answer to a question. "I have been thirty years a householder, and never one of the gentry has deigned to visit me. I often think that the man who takes no precaution comes off best in this matter. I have known some men spent a fortune in locks and bolts, and have a housebreaker in as regularly as the chimney sweep. You did not know my partner, Wilkins? He's been dead these dozen years, and before things went wrong with him, and I bought him out, he had a collection of coins worth £1,000. Well, he kept the treasure in a room whose windows were sheathed nightly in heavy shutters, bolted and bolted again. But, of course, he rose one fine morning to find the lot gone. That broke the old fellow's heart, and from then till they placed him in Norwood cemetery he was never off the rocks."

As the old gentleman proceeded in a lower voice to tell stories of the burglaries that he had known befall his friends, the tall young fellow immediately behind him showed evident signs of nervousness. He shifted uneasily in his seat, and, as ever and anon, the gaslights were passed, his pinched face showed white, and his big eyes seemed riveted on the jovial Nedham. When the merchant left the 'bus with a hearty "good night!" to all and sundry, the stripling rose and slipped off, too.

Twelve midnight had long since boomed from the church steeple opposite, and still Thomas Nedham, city merchant and importer, lay wide awake. Usually he was a heavy sleeper, but to-night slumber had deserted him.

His active brain insisted on scrutinizing and dissecting the stock and share list of the previous day, and gamboling through his now silent city warehouse. The old gentleman chuckled as he held his eyes tight, and conjured before him the thousands of great bales that lumbered every inch of his stores.

"Wonderful!" he said audibly. "What a great thing may sometimes grow from a small one, to be sure! Only thirty years ago and I was wondering how I could meet a bill for £2 15s. Now, new blocks added, six and fifty warehouses, piles of paying work and still growing, growing, growing. Wonder what Wilkins would think of it all if he were looking up now? Poor Wilkins! They tell me he died declaring that I had robbed him. That was a hard thing to say. No robbery, say I, but a business transaction. Besides, in any case, it was a question of tit-for-tat. But for Wilkins I should not have been a bachelor."

Nedham moved uneasily in bed, and, through a doorway arched with troubled memory, he stole to the land of forgetfulness.

How long he slept he hardly knew, but he woke with a start. He had the distinct impression that he felt warm breath on his face, and, springing out of bed, he switched on the electric light. No trace of an intruder was in the room, but the door, which Nedham felt sure he had shut, stood partly ajar.

Hastily pulling on his dressing gown and shoving his bare feet into slippers, he reached a heavy riding crop from the wall and stumbled downstairs. As he opened the drawing room door there was the shuffle of hasty feet, and when the light went up a tall young fellow, shabbily dressed, stood revealed. The two men faced each other across the table, Nedham gripping tight the whip handle.

"Now," he said, in a wonderfully composed voice, "I've caught you clean. What in all the world may you want here?"

The youngster removed his battered hat, and his eyes fell as a tinge of color rose to his cheek.

"A straight question demands a straight answer," he replied. "I am in quest of some of the silver plate you boasted about on the top of the Hampstead 'bus last night. I overheard that conversation."

Nedham laughed, and laid the crop on the table.

"You young fool!" he said. "You do not know Tom Nedham, or you would not have tried this mug's game on." He rubbed his hands. "Tom Nedham has never been known to be caught napping—never!"

"I have heard said," replied the burglar nervously, "that you are a smart man of business—a very smart man of business," he added, raising his eyes and looking Nedham squarely in the face,

"You flatter me, young man," chuckled the portly merchant. "And who, may I ask, reported so favorably of me?"

"My name," replied the stripling, leaning over the table—"my name is Wilkins; my father was your partner." And having fired that shot he awaited results.

II.

Nedham shivered slightly and his face changed color. In a moment, however, he had mastered himself.

"Ah," he said, lightly, "are you the boy I've heard him speak so often about? How strangely people meet sometimes! Who could have dreamed that I should have had the pleasure of seeing you at such an unlikely hour and place? Sit down, sir—sit down!"

The stripling sat in silence; for a minute no words passed.

"I suppose," Wilkins muttered at last, "you will now send for the police?"

The merchant laughed loudly as he lay back in his chair.

"Why police?" he said. "You have not robbed me."

"I had that intention," was the reply. "But, like most of my other schemes in life, it did not come off. But, remember, if I had cleared your sideboard I should not have called myself a robber—not even a law-breaker. My father has told me that you robbed him, and were the cause of his ruin at the end."

Nedham drew himself up, fidgeting on his seat.

"I do assure you," he said soothingly, "there is no vestige of truth in the accusation. You may not know that your father was subject to hallucination long before we parted company."

"I disagree with you, sir," put in the other, with a trembling lip. "But that is all past now, and need not be mourned over. My father is far beyond business trickery at this moment. But, candidly, I bear you a bitter grudge, and ever will do so. So does another—my mother."

"Your mother?" queried the old man, in a whisper. "She is still alive, then? Ah, the mention of her brings back to me the days of youth. I presume your father never told you how he came between us, and made the only woman I ever loved his wife? I——"

"I am in no mood for sentiment," the young man interrupted. "And, besides, that, too, is a bygone. What I do know is that the terrible crash came unexpectedly, and brought down to the earth like a card-castle all that made for happiness with us. I had to leave college, and, though I have tried, I never have been able to mend the broken thread of my life. But all this does not interest you." And he moved toward the door.

As the gentleman-burglar passed into the hall he turned with a forced smile and said:

"I came by the back door and will go by it, I presume?"

"Not at all!" cried Nedham effusively. "No visitor at Woodlands has ever been allowed to do that. Let me show you out by the front door, and, when next you come to see me, perhaps you will give me fairer warning than you did this morning."

He opened the door and held out his hand. The youngster took it coldly.

"By the way," said the merchant, "is your mother in need of money?"

"Money?" said Wilkins, drawing himself up proudly on the doorstep. "Charity? And from such as you? Thank God, we are not yet reduced to that level!"

And so saying, he passed out into the night.

Nedham listened to the retreating footsteps for some moments, and then quietly shut the door.

"Queer fellow, certainly!" he chuckled. "But a boy of spirit—ay, a boy of spirit!" he added emphatically, as he pulled on the bolts.

The Australian branch of Mr. Nedham's business, which he opened at Melbourne some four years ago, is thriving beyond all expectations. But when business friends congratulate Mr. Nedham, he laughs and says:

"I mustn't take the credit. It's young Wilkins' concern. I'm taking him into partnership with the New Year."

Odd Effect of the Sun.

The effect of strong and continual sunshine on the features is, it seems, most damaging. A writer in a Sydney paper points out that the women in some parts of Queensland are contracting a lifted upper lip. This he attributes to the fierce Queensland sunlight, which causes one to contract the facial muscles near the eyes in order to avoid the glare. The rest of the face is, of course, affected by these muscles.

Every girl of sixteen has so many important secrets with her girl friends that she longs for a cipher when she talks to them over the telephone.

BASE-BURNER THE THING.

The Old Man Says It Beats Other Heaters and that Steam and Hot Air Won't Do for the Family Use

"Well you can talk about your steam heat and your hot water pipes and your furnaces and your natural gas all you want to, but as for me give me the good old-fashioned base-burner," said the old man as he stretched out his hands toward a glowing pattern of his favorite heater of the style of about 1885. "There's something kind of artificial about these other things, even natural gas," he continued. "Some way or another they don't go to the spot—not with me. They make me feel just like I had on a new pair of boots, and mighty bad fitting ones at that. They go against the grain and don't make me feel at home. And, besides, they don't always deliver the goods. Now, just look at this one. You bet it delivers the goods all the time."

The old gentleman was right, at the moment, at least, for in the lamplight you could fairly see the heat shooting away from the base-burner. The thermometer registered 87 degrees and the furniture near by was beginning to smell "scorchy" and little warts in the paint had raised up on the side next the stove.

"Yes, sir," went on the base-burner advocate, "you can't find anything that'll touch the base-burner." (Certainly his proposition would not have been disputed just then.) "There's a lot of poetry to be found looking into a base-burner that is in good working order. Now, where are you going to find any poetry in looking down into a register that is spouting up nothing but a big stream of hot air, and how are you going to find it putting your feet up against a steam radiator? Shucks! There's nothing in the world like a base-burner for the family to gather around. I tell you the base-burner is the heart of the home. Here the children and the old folks can get together in the right kind of style. Imagine a family gathering around a steam coil or snuggling up to the hot air shooting up from the furnace. That would promote a family feeling in fine style, wouldn't it?"

"You see, the old base-burner, with its ruddy glow and radiating heat, just sends out good feeling that can't be resisted. When the winter blasts are howling outside, fairly shaking the chimney, and shrieking around the corners and banking up the snow against the side of the house, then's the time you realize what home would be without a base-burner. That's the time that all of us hustle up to the stove in a kind of semi-circle. Nobody gets clear behind the stove, where the chimney is, but that's the only place they leave clear. Then we just have a good old family talk. Me and the boys yank off our boots so's to get real comfortable and the women folks peel the apples an' we crack nuts, eat popcorn an' drink cider an' have the all-firedest good time you ever did see.

"Then if any of the boys has got bruises on their ankles where their boots rubbed while they were tryin' to skate, this is the time that mother gets out her home-made salve and fixes 'em up. You can't do tricks like that in front of a hot water radiator. I s'pose if the boys broke through the ice and come in with their feet wet they could, maybe, dry with furnace er steam heat, but they couldn't do it quick and do it good and right, like they could with the old base-burner.

"An' you say all you please about these new-fangled heats, but you can't make me believe that you er me could look at 'em hard enough er long enough to see things in 'em. They wouldn't help you none to solve yer problems er lighten yer burdens. But you can git all that kind of help out of the base-burner. Ye can see figures and things in the red-hot coals you couldn't find in no radiators er registers. I've looked into them coals many and many a time and found out how to do just the right thing. All I had to do was to keep lookin' there long enough and the way was made clear. Why, I want to tell you a good base burner just beats a crack fortune teller all to pieces every day in the week. And all this is the reason why I maintain that a base-burner is the only thing to have in the house fer heatin' purposes and fer gettin' the family together and makin' 'em feel right."

AROUND THE OLD BASEBURNER.

VEILS AND THE EYESIGHT.

Women Often Ruin Their Vision by Wearing Such Gauze.

One would naturally suppose the eyesight is of such inestimable value that rational human beings would scrupulously shun all risk of impairing it, and that above all things fashion should not be permitted to decree modes whose effect is to weaken that most sensitive of the organs, the eye. Yet it is a deplorable fact that many of the fashions are blindly followed by the fair sex at the behest of some "leader" in the gay world of society.

The veil is one of the fashions of the present, as it has been of past times. The sex is divided in opinion as to the effects of the veil upon the vision, but where you will find one to maintain that such an adornment fades the complexion you will find ten to aver that no penalties would prevent them from wearing it.

Go and ask an oculist his opinion, and what he has to say on the topic is to plump condemnation upon every veil that is worn. Yet he will admit that, while some nets are extremely dangerous and deleterious to the eyes, others are almost uninjurious. There are fashions in nets and gauzes, and many are the variations with which the veil is worn, but in England it always covers the eyes, and it is here that the danger arises.

Of all the veils ever tried, the ideal one is yet to be discovered. Some women can trace step by step its evolution throughout the century. They have heard their grandmothers talk about the white lace "fall" that used to be liked, and themselves can recollect the thick green, blue, gray, white and green gauze horrors worn to protect the complexion from tan. Those veils were followed by thinner silk ones, which in their turn were deposed in favor of those of thread lace, after which came the many abominations still exploited, to wit, mesh nets dotted and patterned in various ways.

Just now they are wearing most curtailed ones again, and a feeling has also come in there for the utter banishment of the veil. A more uncomfortable and imbecile affair for afternoon teas than the mask and the chin veil is cannot be imagined.

It is a sign of grace, perhaps, that the question which is being much debated now among smart people is whether the veil does not accomplish so much harm to the visual organ as to outweigh all other considerations in its favor. They wonder whether a veil could not be contrived that would leave the eyes uncovered, while it beautified and protected the rest of the face. As a pattern, nothing could be better than the Turkish woman's yashmak, which is justly held to be the most modest face covering in existence.

The very best is a veil as fine as gossamer, which can also be most becoming, too. It has no spots at all upon it, and so does not worry the poor tortured eyes that have to dodge spots or vainly and unconsciously try to focus them, one of the worst possible exercises to which weak or imperfect sight can be put. The retrograde step is taken by Russian net veiling, which need not, however, be very trying if the mesh be fine, for it is unspotted.

Then come the quite condemned veils, which have chenille spots all over them; they are bad in proportion, as their dots are close and large or scanty and small, but they are less sight-wearing than a veil that is patterned as well as spotted, a veritable agony to sensitive sight. White veils are often much more evil in their effects than black, for the material, be it tulle or net, possesses a faculty for dazzling the vision and making everything seen through it wavering and ill-defined. Finally, has not the case been proven that those who are conscious of strain, a lack of clarity of sight or weariness after wearing a veil, should give up the task of looking smart at the expense of vision. Even the strong argument in favor of veils of a sensible and clear mesh, which the oculists do not attempt to deny, namely, that such nets do keep the eyes from the assaults of grit, especially during a drive or while cycling and motoring, should not appeal to the weak-sighted.

SIGHT TRAPS—FIVE SPECIMENS OF THE INJURIOUS VEIL.

COLOR OF GOLD COINS.

Reasons for Differences in Tint of Coins of French Mintage.

Some time ago a Frenchman placed together a numbers of gold coins of French mintage of the beginning, middle and end of the last century. He was much surprised to see that they differed in color. He set about finding out the reasons for this difference, and the results of his investigations have been published in La Nature.

There is a paleness about the yellow of the ten and twenty-franc pieces which bear the effigies of Napoleon I. and Louis XVIII. that is not observed in the gold of later mintage. One admirer of these coins speaks of their color as a "beautiful paleness" and expresses regret that it is lacking in later coins. The explanation of it is very simple. The alloy that entered into the French gold coins of those days contained as much silver as copper, and it was the silver that gave the coins their interesting paleness.

The coins of the era of Napoleon III. were more golden in hue. The silver had been taken out of the alloy.

The gold coins of to-day have a still warmer and deeper tinge of yellow. This is because the Paris mint, as well as that in London, melts the gold and the copper alloy in hermetically sealed boxes, which prevents the copper from being somewhat bleached, as it always is when it is attacked by hot air; so the present coins have the full warmness of tint that a copper alloy can give.

If the coins of to-day are not so handsome in the opinion of amateur collectors as those issued by the first Napoleon, they are superior to those of either of the Napoleons in the fact that it costs less to make them. The double operation of the oxidation of the copper and cleaning it off the surface of the coin with acids is no longer employed; and the large elimination of copper from the surface of the coins, formerly practiced, made them less resistant under wear and tear than are the coins now in circulation.

PARIS IS BEST FORTIFIED.

Twenty-one Miles of Defenses Now Guard the French Capital.

The best fortified city in the world is Paris. It is defended by seven great forts about the city, eight miles away from its walls; nineteen smaller forts four miles out, each containing three acres and mounting two ninety-five-ton guns. Great stacks of 100-pound melinite shells are ready for these guns to hurl. There are twenty-one miles of continuous fortifications about the town—earth-work walls 150 feet thick at the base and fronted by forty-five-foot moats. So cleverly are the forts masked by long slopes of green turf and the walls by trees and bushes that one can pass in and out of Paris a dozen times and see scarcely a trace of its fortifications.

The range of the ninety-five-ton guns is fourteen miles. To work these guns Paris has 50,000 trained artillerymen among her reservists. She could man every gun twice over, garrison all her forts with infantry reservists and put a dozen cavalry regiments into the field for scouting purposes. Such a performance no other city on earth could rival.

At every 1,000 yards along the inner slope of the fortifications is a three-story guardhouse. Some 20,000 troops could thus be sheltered within call of all attackable points. Every horse over 4 years old is registered. The general staff could choose from some 120,000 horses. There are in Paris 1,600 cabs, with three horses to a cab—48,000 mounts fairly suitable for cavalry. Add 20,000 tram and bus horses and 50,000 draught horses—the balance may be taken as in private hands. The military stores of Paris are boundless. In a day she could arm and clothe 450,000 fighting men with 70,000,000 rounds of melinite cartridges, and at the army bakeries she reserves large stores of grain.

A Spider's Thread.

What we call a spider's thread consists of more than 4,000 threads united.

The girl who used mucilage to keep her hair in curl has been much stuck-up ever since.

Fools are apt to discern the faults of others and overlook their own.

Finding His Hat.

Robbie's hat was lost. He could not find it anywhere, and his mother was waiting for him to go out and do an errand for her.

"Hurry up, Robbie!" she said, coming into the sitting room. "I must have that yeast cake right away."

"I can't find my hat!" said Robbie, beginning to search in every nook and corner. "I guess, mamma, you will have to get somebody else to do that errand for you. I can't go downtown bareheaded."

Just then a wagon drove into the yard, and Uncle Will's voice cried out:

"Where's Robbie? I want to take him out to the farm."

"Here I am, Uncle Will—I'm coming!" cried Robbie.

And what do you suppose?—in less than two seconds Robbie's hat was on his head, and he was bounding out into the yard!

His mother could hardly help smiling at the suddenness with which the little lad had found his hat after he really wanted to; but she knew that it would not do to let his deceit go unpunished, so she hurried out into the yard. Robbie was just scrambling up into the farm wagon.

"Uncle Will," said his mother, "Robbie was going to do an errand for me, but it took him so very long to find his hat—until he heard you call—that I am afraid he will not be back in time to go out to the farm with you to-day."

"Ah!" said Uncle Will; "I see. No, Robbie, do not think I can wait for you to-day. But some other day, when your hat doesn't keep you from getting mamma's errands done first, we will have a fine ride out to the farm."

Robbie felt his disappointment, you may be sure. But he was an honest-minded chap, and by the time he had returned with his mother's yeast-cake he was quite ready to admit in his own heart that his punishment was just what he deserved.

"And, mamma," he said, as he kissed her lovingly, "I don't think I shall ever lose my hat that way again."—Young People's Weekly.

Korean Children.

As a little lass the Korean girl is taught all about domestic work, and begins early to assist her mother in making the family clothes. If too young to paste she can at least hold over the stove the long iron rod to be used in pressing seams. The heating of this rod is the first thing taught a little girl. Later she learns how to paste clothes together, then to wash and iron them.

Now, this use of paste instead of thread is a custom, so far as I know, practiced only by the Koreans. It is done on account of their mode of ironing. To accomplish this difficult feat they rip their garments to pieces before putting them in water. After the washing, garments are laid on a smooth block of wood or stone and are beaten with ironing sticks. These sticks resemble a policeman's club, and each ironer uses two.

Girls and boys wear their hair hanging in two plaits until engaged to be married, after which the boy fastens his on top of his head and the girl twists hers at the nape of her neck. Koreans hold marriage in high regard, and show a married man profound respect, while a bachelor is treated by them with marked contempt. I have seen men greet a slip of a boy wearing a topknot with ceremonious deference, saying to each other: "He is a man; he is about to be married," while of a much older man, and possibly a richer, who wears his two plaits, they remark that "He is a pig. He cannot get a wife. He will always be a boy."

In the choice of his first bride the Korean leaves everything to the "go-between." But all other wives, and a Korean may have ten, the man makes his own selection. Women are well treated, and, as a rule, live happy, contented lives. They are gentle, attractive bodies and devoted to their homes.

Verses of Childhood.

At evening, when the lamp is lit,
Around the fire my parents sit;
They sit at home and talk and sing,
And do not play at anything.

Now, with my little gun, I crawl,
All in the dark along the wall,
And follow round the forest track,
Away behind the sofa back.

There, in the night, when none can spy,
All in my hunter's camp I lie,
And play at books that I have read
Till it is time to go to bed.

When I am grown to man's estate
I shall be very proud and great,
And tell the other girls and boys
Not to meddle with my toys.

Every night my prayers I say,
And get my dinner every day;
And every day that I've been good
I get an orange after food.

The child that is not clean and neat,
With lots of toys and things to eat,
He is a naughty child, I'm sure—
Or else his dear papa is poor.
—R. L. Stevenson, in "A Child's Garden of Verse."

Playthings of Royal Folks.

The Prince of Wales as a boy was very fond of a toy fortress and the toys he and the other little royal folks played with years ago are now brought from their hiding place, so that the present young ones of the reigning family may play with them at Osborne house. The children of the Duke of York take great delight in the former toy fortress of the Prince of Wales, with its mounted brass cannon placed in position as they were more than fifty years ago. Then there is a woolly dog that runs across the floor clumsily, an elephant moving its trunk up and down and with mouth open, and a bagatelle board—all are enjoyed to-day as they were over a half century ago by the then little folks of the family.

Many children who are not of royal birth play with costlier toys than these. The children of Queen Victoria's daughter, Princess Beatrice of Battenberg, have playthings that are very plain, such as gardening tools, scrap books, common story books and cheap dolls.

When the present Czar of Russia was a child his playthings were toy forts and cannon and tin soldiers, picture books with colored battle scenes. His chief reading was short stories about them, and he knew by heart the great war history of his own country. After this boy became a Czar and ruled the whole country he realized how his people were suffering on account of taxation necessary to pay the expenses of this vast military machine, and he proposed a conference of all the powers of Europe with a view of persuading them to disband their armies.

A Look to the Future.

The boy of the present has a glimpse of the twentieth century boy.

OLD-FASHIONED GRANDMOTHER

It Is to Be Regretted that She Is Rapidly Becoming a Thing of the Past.

Persons who still cling with some love to old ways and old fashions will read with approval Temple Bailey's dainty little lament over the "Passing of the Grandmother" in the Woman's Home Companion. He says, in part:

"The status of the grandmother of the past was fixed and immovable. Having once acquired the title she was allowed no other. Her individuality as woman, wife and mother was lost, and she was ever afterward recognized as one who should set aside all personal ambition and dedicate herself to the care of her children's children.

"To-day we have few grandmothers of that type. Secure in the doctrine of individual rights, the grandmother of modern times declines to sacrifice her life to the demands of others. Her life is her own, she argues; she has raised her own children, and now is her time for rest; her daughter must attend to the rising generation.

"But from the children's standpoint the passing of the grandmother is a calamity. They will read the stories of the past, and will long for the tender hearts and willing hands that gave themselves in service. Perhaps the hearts are just as tender to-day, but the hands are engaged in other work, and childish minds have a strange way of looking for actions rather than motives. The children want the grandmother whose kitchen is a fairy-land of spicy odors and forbidden sweets, not the grandmother who drives them to the fine candy-shop and treats them to chocolates and Scotch kisses. In their small minds, better is the corn in the popper with molasses-taffy made at home than ice cream and marrons glace from the confectioner. The modern child may have many advantages, but he will still envy his ancestors who in childhood sat and watched the molasses bubbling, bubbling, as it boiled in a cauldron, the fire-light making flickering shadows as their grandmother told them tales of primitive days, of bears and Indians and wars."

"How Soon We Are Forgot."

A writer in a Washington newspaper, in a column devoted to instructive and entertaining chat about the capitol, expresses surprise because in the basement of the building are portraits of "worthy old gentleman" forgotten by "nine-tenths" of the visitors to the building, who wonders somewhat why Richard Montgomery, Thomas Mifflin, Charles Thomson, and Francis Hopkinson should find a place in the memory of the painter and on the wall of the Senate basement. The writer had looked in Fiske's "History of the United States" and could not find either Thomson or Hopkinson. When he goes to Quebec he may find the mark to indicate where Montgomery fell while trying to capture the citadel and the house in which he died. At St. Paul's church, New York, he can find his tomb. Mifflin he can find as the president of the congress that received Washington's resignation, and Thomson he will discover to have been regarded as one of the brightest men of the revolutionary time; while he has but to look at the original Declaration of Independence to see "Fras." Hopkinson's name, one of the best known of all signers because of the brilliancy and variety of his accomplishments. — New York Times.

Kitchen Necessities.

She Was Too Mad to Speak.

The Washington woman came across some excellent tea in England—tea the like of which she had never known before. She knew there was none of it to be had in America, so she bought pounds and pounds of it to bring home with her. She didn't mean to pay duty on it, for she felt that no really patriotic American can consistently pay a tea tax after what our ancestors did in Boston harbor, so she made herself a petticoat, and into the lining thereof she quilted the tea. When the steamer drew into port, she put on the garment. To wear it was martyrdom. It seemed to weigh a ton. She could scarcely walk in it, and the hang of her new going ashore gown was utterly ruined by it, but the custom house officials let her pass without suspicion. She went directly to the railway station and started for Washington. The journey will live long in her memory for its discomfort. Her husband met her at the station. He marked her pale, worn look. As they stepped into the carriage she told him the story.

"I wasn't going to let them get ahead of me," she said proudly. "Wasn't it a lovely idea?"

Her husband fell back in the carriage and roared.

"Lovely!" he said. "Lovely! I should say it was. Why, my dear, there isn't any duty on tea."

And let me remark in passing that the child's sob in the silence isn't by any means the only thing that curseth deeper than the strong man in his wrath.—Washington Post.

The President In Public.

It is a point of etiquette, universally observed at the national capital, never to obtrude attentions upon the president when he appears in public. On the street or in any place of amusement in Washington the president has the undisputed privilege of appearing as any private citizen. He is never stared at unless it is by strangers, and his appearance in a theater is not greeted with any sort of demonstration. The president may walk where he pleases in the streets of Washington, meeting with no further notice than the tipping of a hat, unless of his own motion he stops to speak with some one. Office seekers and petitioners never venture to approach him on the street. His surest riddance of the importunities of the throng is to go out among them.

Sir Julian Pauncefote, speaking of the American customs that had impressed him, remarked that, while a foreigner's first impression might be that the seeming indifference of the public toward the president when he appeared on the street or at the theater was the result of an exaggerated idea of democracy, it must become apparent on closer observation that it was the highest possible tribute of respect and consideration.—San Francisco Argonaut.

She Could Bargain.

Mr. Smithers—Martha, I don't know how we can afford to give this dinner you're plannin. Things hain't been comin my way very swift lately. We've got to save money. You better call it off.

Mrs. Smithers—Josiah, you make me weary. If you're gittin pinched, that's only the more reason why we've got to keep up appearances. Let folks git the suspicion that we're hard up and everybody that we owe money to will git after us at once. No; I'm goin to give this blowout, and it's goin to be great. I'll astonish the natives. I've got three poets, an artist and a crack fiddler engaged to—

Mr. Smithers—Goodness gracious! But where are we goin to git the cash for all these things?

Mrs. Smithers—Sh-h! I've got a standoff at the grocery for the eatables. The fiddler is to take a suit of your old clothes for his pay, and, of course, the artists and poets'll come free. They even agree not to send their plates back for second helpin's. If you ain't got a wife who can bargain, I'd like to have you tell me why.—Chicago News.

His Burglar.

A Philadelphia real estate man, when going through a vacant house one evening to see that all was well, heard a slight noise behind him. Turning slightly, he saw the form of a man. As the broker was not armed, he did not like the idea of meeting a burglar in combat, and, besides, he is very timid, so he rushed to the door and fumbled with the lock, all the time yelling at the top of his lungs. When he had got the door opened, he looked back, and then saw that the "burglar" was really his own reflection in the large drawing room mirror. He had no sooner made this discovery than he was seized by two policemen, who were attracted by his screams, and it took nearly a half hour for him to explain that he was not a housebreaker himself.

WOODIN.—In Los Angeles, April 10, 1901, Irving Oakley Woodin, a native of New York, aged about 23 years.

DIAZ.—In Lone Pine, April 10, 1901, Dona, beloved wife of Eleuterio Diaz, aged about 26 years.

Wm. Matlack went to Big Pine yesterday morning.

Ben. H. Yandell, Esq., went to Bishop Thursday morning.

Charles Collins came down from Black Canyon Wednesday evening.

Edwin Cox and Mr Lewis arrived from Reno last Monday evening.

Mrs Avah Bell left for Los Angeles last Monday afternoon to join her husband.

John Calloway came in from Ballarat Wednesday after a load of grain and other produce.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Schabbell left Wednesday afternoon for Los Angeles by private conveyance.

R. P. Hession of Big Pine was a visitor in Independence for a couple of days in the early part of the week.

Lee Bell, who has been attending school in Los Angeles for the past few months, returned home last Friday evening.

Arthur Smith came in from the Minnietta mine yesterday morning, and is now laid up with a severe attack of erysipelas.

Tom Ferguson returned from the oil fields near Heiwei on Monday last, and started for the new mining camp of Tonapah, Nevada, on Thursday morning.

Supt. A M. Squire came down from Mazourka canyon yesterday. He reports the mine as looking fine and the future prospects as more than encouraging.

LOST OR STOLEN.—An ice-cream freezer, with cream, from the Rebekahs. Finder please return the ice-cream and no questions asked about the freezer. INO.

A. F. Mairs, Geo. McConnell and Thomas Kehoe started for the Coso springs yesterday afternoon. They expect to return in a couple of weeks free from all the ills that flesh is heir to.

It is reported that a contract has been let for the sinking of two wells in the oil belt near Heiwei Meadows. The machinery has been ordered and active operations will commence by June 1st.

Last evening Mrs. F. F. Densmore had a gathering of Rebekahs at her home and for the occasion had made up a freezer of ice-cream. After removing the cream she placed the freezer on the porch outside, covering it with a sack. Some of our young men passing by noticed the freezer, and knowing the delicious solid contents it contained, determined to steal it for a joke. Mr. Densmore noticing some peculiar movements of some persons on the outside determined to help them carry out the joke by placing rocks and water in the freezer to give it the proper weight. As expected the freezer and contents were taken, and at this writing the freezer had not been returned. Mr. Densmore is in a quandary to know who the joke is on?

The Committee having in charge the straightening of the road running north from Leece & Watterson's corner in Bishop, was allowed further time or until the July meeting to report.

The following resolution was passed by the Board:

"It having been brought to our attention that the building of certain encroachments in the nature of water cisterns upon some of the public highways of the County is contemplated; it is the sense of this Board that permission will not be granted by the Board nor by any member thereof to any person or persons to build water cisterns or ditches in or upon the public highways, and that each member as Road Commissioner, will take active measures to prevent attempted encroachments of this kind, as well as any others, believing as we do, that our public highways should be used and kept for road purposes only, as provided by law."

It was ordered that a safe be purchased from H. P. Cartier for the joint use of the Assessor and Clerk, and that the Auditor draw a warrant on the General Expense Fund for $80 to pay for the same.

T. C. Boland was authorized to purchase bridge plank for his District and the Auditor was ordered to draw a warrant on the Bridge Fund to pay for same, upon Mr. Boland's presenting the bill to him.

Tonopah Mines Sold.

J. A. Brent and W. C. Price, well-known mining capitalists of this coast, have purchased the eight principal mines of Tonapah district. The price is $350,000.

Mr. Brent visited the camp last week, when the sale was made. Part of the money was paid on the spot and the balance will be paid as soon as the titles are found satisfactory. Mr. Brent departed for San Francisco Monday, but will return this week, when all details will be arranged and the transfer made.

It is the intention of the new owners to erect reduction works in the near future as close to the mines as fuel and water can be procured. The exact location of the mills is not yet determined, and a thorough examination of the surrounding country will be made to find the most practicable point.

This sale will prove of great benefit to the State generally and to this section particularly, as it will be the means of attracting more capital and give our county the benefit of up-to-date legitimate methods.—Walker Lake Bulletin.

Death of Irving O. Woodin.

The sad news of the death of Irving Oakley Woodin, who died in Los Angeles was received here Wednesday morning. A week ago last Monday Dr. I. J. Woodin received a dispatch apprising him of the critical illness of his son, who was suffering from cerebral meningitis. The Doctor started immediately for Los Angeles and remained with his son until the end. An operation was performed from which he never rallied. Irving was a young man of unusual promise and his untimely taking off will be a source of deep regret to his many warm friends in this vicinity who have known him since childhood. The Doctor has the sincere sympathy of the entire community in his bereavement. Irving Oakley Woodin was the only child of Dr. I. J. Woodin. He was a native of New York and aged about 23 years.

Talk about sprinting! Why, you ought to have seen two of our young ladies yesterday morning getting out of the way of an enraged cow. They were walking on one of our back streets, when the cow evidently took exceptions to their apparel and started in pursuit. One of the young ladies said she hastily got inside of a friendly and near-by gate, but an onlooker said she vaulted over the four-foot picket fence with the greatest ease. The other scorned such tactics and took the straight-away course for a safety goal, about seventy-five yards away. My, but how she did run, for when she reached a place of safety the enraged animal was outside the distance flag and gave up the chase in disgust. Both the ladies were badly scared and do not wish a recurrence of the adventure.

David O. Anderson of the Title Insurance & Trust Co., of Los Angeles, arrived in Independence Wednesday evening. Before returning home Mr. Anderson will make a tour of the valley, with a view of gaining a more thorough knowledge of its wonderful resources and capabilities. We understand that Mr. Anderson, in company with others, thinks of investing quite an amount of money in real estate in this county.

TO OUR PATRONS.—On the night of April 26, 1901, our Ladies parlor will be fitted up for the convenience and comfort of our lady friends from out of town who intend attending the Rebekah and Odd Fellows' Ball. A cordial invitation is extended to all to make use of same.

Respectfully,
INYO MERCANTILE CO.

A teacher at Ballarat said to the primary class the other day: "If your father gave your mother $7 to-day and $8 to-morrow what would she have?" And the small boy over in the corner replied. "She would have a fit."

One of our exchanges announces the marriage of William Williams and Willie Wills. The editor missed the announcement and said. "For futher particulars see small bills."

Dr. I. J. Woodin is expected home next Tuesday morning.

SCHOOL LEGISLATION.

Following is an outline of school legislation enacted at the last legislature. The bill goes into effect on the first day of July, and the important changes which it makes in the present law regulating the granting of teachers' certificates are as follows:

1. No more primary certificates will be issued.

2. County boards will hold no more examinations for high school certificates, such certificates being issued on credentials designated by the state board of education.

3. County boards may grant on examination only two classes of certificates—special and grammar grade. Under the present law, each county board selects the subjects on which applicants must be examined for grammar grade certificates, the result being almost as many standards as there are counties in the state. Under the new law the subjects for grammar grade certificates are made uniform throughout the state. These subjects are: Reading, English grammar and advanced composition, English and American literature, orthography and defining, penmanship, drawing, vocal music, bookkeeping, algebra to quadratics, plane geometry, geography (physical, political and industrial) elementary physics, physiology and hygiene, history of the United States and civil government, history (ancient, medieval and modern), school law, methods of teaching.

4. No more educational diplomas will be issued.

5. Under the present law seventy months' experience in teaching, extending through ten calendar years, is required for a life diploma. Under the new law, but forty-two months' experience is required, and there is no requirement concerning calendar years.

6. On five years' experience in teaching county boards may issue life certificates valid within the county.

7. Examination for granting certificates will be held but once each year.

8. All the special privileges now belonging to teachers who are graduates of of the University of California, or of the State Normal schools are extended to the graduates of similar institutions of equal rank in all parts of the world. The special course now existing in the University of California for normal school graduates is also abolished. These changes abolish the special privileges now enjoyed by the graduates of the State University and of the State Normal schools, over the graduates of similar institutions of equal rank in other parts of the world.

All the rights conferred by certificates now in existence are carefully safeguarded, and provision is made for the renewal of these certificates.

The certification bill is most cosmopolitan and sane, and on the question of the certification of teachers, California now leads the states of the union.

Laborers Consider This.

A carpenter working for $2 50 a day in 1896 should get $4.43 now to keep up with demands of the sugar trusts.

A section hand working for $1.25 a day in 1896 should get $2.12½ to-day to keep up with the price of beans.

A street car driver working for $1.50 per day in 1896 should get $2.70 per day now to keep up with the advance in salt pork.

A steer weighing 1000 would buy nearly four times more barbed wire in 1896 than in 1900.

A hog weighing 200 pounds would buy 105 pounds more nails in 1896 then it would now.

A Studebaker wagon could be bought for seventy-one bushels of wheat in 1896; in 1900 a wagon could not be bought for less than 103 bushels of wheat.

A bushel of wheat would buy three times more twine in 1896 than it would buy in 1900 (See United States Treasury bulletin).

A dozen chickens would buy twenty gallons of oil in 1896; in 1900 only 13½ gallons.

Thirty-four pounds of wheat would buy as much tinware in 1898 as a bushel will buy to-day.

A bushel of wheat buys 119 pounds less of salt than it would in 1898.

A bale of cotton would buy two-fifths more feet of lumber in 1896 than it would buy in 1899.

And so on down the line. Why is this difference? is asked. Look at the trust record—the number of big concerns, with heavy capitalization, that have been formed, forcing the small tradesman and storekeeper to the wall, and the answer is plain enough.—City Argus.

The New Game Law.

Several changes have been made in the game laws by the present legislature, of which the following are the most important:

That any person who between Febuary 1st and October 1st hunts or kill quail, partridge, grouse or sagehen, or any kind of wild duck, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

That any person who between Febuary 1st and August 1st hunts or kills a dove is guilty of a misdemeanor.

That it is a misdemeanor to hunt or kill Mongolian or English pheasants or Bob White quail or English partridge.

That it is a misdemeanor to kill more than 25 quail, partridge or snipe, or more than 50 ducks or more than 25 rails in one day.

That it is a misdemeanor to hunt or kill a female deer, spotted fawn, antelope, elk or mountain sheep.

That any person who hunts or kills a a male deer between October 1st and August 1st is guilty of misdemeanor.

That it is a misdemeanor for any one person to kill more than three deer in a single open season.

That the purchase or sale of quail, partridge, pheasant, grouse, sage-hen, plover or deer meat is a misdemeanor.

A violation of any of the above provisions will be punishable by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $500.

Facts for Women

Any article, whatever its merit, must be made known to the public by means of advertising. Advertising, however, though it can do much for a thing, cannot do everything. It may create a sale for a time, but in order to insure a lasting demand the thing advertised must have solid worth.

This is the case with Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It has solid worth.

Women everywhere have learned this fact, and the result is that there is a lasting and absolutely unequaled demand for it. It has the largest sale of any remedy for female ills in the world, and this has been the case for years.

The reason for this is that Mrs. Pinkham claims nothing that she is not entitled to claim. She can do all that she says she can do, and her twenty years of experience make her advice invaluable. Her experience has been not only long but world-wide, and she has helped more women back to health than any one else in the world. These facts should, and do, have immense weight with all sensible women. Remember these are not wild statements but solid facts.

Facts About the Good Being Done by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound in Cases of Change of Life, Bearing-Down Pains, Etc.

"I had falling, inflammation and ulceration of the womb; backache, bearing-down pains; was so weak and nervous that I could not do my own work; had sick headache, no appetite, numb spells, hands and feet cold all the time. I had good doctors, but none of them did me any good. Through the advice of a lady friend I began the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and after taking one bottle I felt greatly relieved, and by the time I had used several bottles was completely cured, so that I could do my work again. I am now passing through the change of life and using your Compound. It helps me wonderfully. I want every suffering woman to know what your medicine has done for me."—MRS. W. M. BULL, New Palestine, Mo.

"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound saved my life and gave back a loving mother to eleven children, which was more than any doctor could have done or any other medicine in the wide world. My trouble was childbed fever. The third day after my babe was born I took a chill, which was followed by a high fever. I would perspire until my clothes were as wet as though dipped in a tub of water. The chills and fever kept up for three days. My daughter got me a bottle of your Compound. The fourth dose stopped the chills, and the fever also disappeared. My life was saved. My age at this critical time was forty-nine."—LYDIA E. BOUGHER, Etna, Pa.

Facts About Two Cases of Falling of the Uterus Recovered by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

"I suffered for fifteen years without finding any relief. I tried doctors, but nothing seemed to do me any good. I had falling of the womb, leucorrhœa, pain in the back and head, and those bearing-down pains. One bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound did me so much good that I sent for four more, also two boxes of Liver Pills and one package of Sanative Wash. After using these I felt like a new woman."—MRS. G. A. WINTER Glidden, Ia., Box 220.

"I was suffering with falling of the womb, painful menstruation, headache, backache, pain in groins, extending into the limbs; also a terrible pain at left of womb. The pain in my back was dreadful during menstruation, and my head would ache until I would be nearly crazy. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has given me great relief. I suffer no pain now, and I give your medicine all the praise."—MRS. J. P. MCSPADDEN, Rosenberg, Tex.

A Grateful Woman Recommends Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to Every Wife and Mother.

"I have taken eight bottles of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound with most gratifying results. I had been married four years and had two children. I was all run down, had falling of womb with all its distressing symptoms. I had doctored with a good physician, but I derived very little good from his treatment. After taking a few bottles of your medicine, I was able to do my work and nurse my seven-months'-old babe. I recommend your medicine to every wife and mother. Had I time, I could write much more in its praise. I bid you Godspeed in your good work."—MRS. L. A. MORRIS, Welaka, Putnam Co., Fla.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM—When I commenced the use of your remedies I was very badly off. Every two weeks I was troubled with flowing spells which made me very weak. I had two of the best doctors, but they did not seem to help me. They said my trouble was caused from weakness and was nothing to worry about. I felt tired all the time; had no ambition. I was growing worse all the time until I began the use of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I am now able to help about the house, and am much improved in health."—MRS. A. WALKER, Callicoon Depot, N. Y.

LITERARY LITTLE BITS

The girl readers of "Pretty Polly Perkins," by Gabrielle E. Jackson, write enthusiastically regarding it, and the book is having a wide sale.

Wm. Dean Howells, the foremost figure in American letters to-day, is to be one of the literary advisers to the reorganized house of Harper & Bros.

"The Biography of a Baby" is the title of an unusual volume by Miss Millicent W. Shinn. Miss Shinn is a Californian and still lives there. She has always been interested in babies, and has made a careful study of them both as teacher and friend.

Miss Martha Bockee Flint, whose volume of essays called "A Garden of Samples" was recently published, died not long ago at the home of her brother in Dutchess County, New York. She was the daughter of the late Augustus Flint and Catherine Bockee, who was a daughter of Judge Bockee of revolutionary fame. Miss Bockee had of late divided her time between history, genealogy, and certain aspects of gardening.

Una L. Silberrad, whose "The Lady of Dreams" has recently been published by Doubleday, Page & Co., is quite a heroine herself in a humble way. She was born in Essex, England, thirty years ago. The oldest daughter of a large family, she has been the head of the household, and it was in the leisure of Sunday afternoon that she wrote the "Enchanter." This book is the fruit of five years' labor, and was at once welcomed as displaying great creative gifts.

Hallie Erminie Rives, whose novel, "A Furnace of Earth," has created such a sensation, is a Kentuckian by birth. Her father owned a thousand slaves before the war. Her mother was a celebrated beauty known as "the beautiful Mary Ragsdale," and from her Miss Rives got her love of horseflesh which shows so clearly in her novels. Amelia Rives, who wrote "The Quick or the Dead," is her cousin. When Hallie Erminie was 15 she wrote a sketch of Adlai Stevenson, which a Chicago publisher at once accepted. "A Furnace of Earth" is said to be the most sensational sex story written since "The Quick or the Dead."

NEW THING IN HYPNOTISM.

Counter-Suggestion Offered as a Preventive of Certain Crimes.

To check the spread of crime through hypnotic suggestion a means has been discovered by Jules Liegeois, a French psychologist of the well-known "Nancy school," who declares that in "counter suggestion" the most perfect protection is found. Liegeois has carried on experiments for many years in company with other scientists at the clinic, where are treated all forms of nervous disease. He discovered in the course of his investigations that even the best sort of hypnotic subject could be prevented from taking criminal suggestions by forbidding it while the person was in a hypnotic state. In spite of every effort, persons ordinarily hypnotized with the greatest ease could not be hypnotized at all while under the first influence, and nothing could be done with them until they had been released from the first hypnotic state by the same person who put them into it.

This discovery is of great importance. Many crimes and offenses have been traced to hypnotic influences. It has been known for years that weak and nervous persons who are easily affected by the magnetic power of others will do whatever they have been told to do while in a hypnotic sleep, even though it was to commit a crime. Liegeois refers to several cases of which he knew personally. One subject, a woman, was compelled to poison her husband and then commit suicide. Four other persons killed themselves and a woman was driven into an unhappy marriage by the hypnotic command of wicked persons. Liegeois says that all persons should know exactly to what extent they are subject to hypnotism, and that if they are easily influenced by this dangerous power they should without hesitation be put in safety by a counter-suggestion so that nobody can hypnotize them or compel them to obey any hynotic suggestions. This treatment should be gene through with at least once or twice a year in order that the effect may not wear off.

Of course there is danger here that the nervous system of the person living in this state of hypnotism might be seriously affected by the restraint under which they would be held. The magnetic nerve force of hypnotism is too tremendous to be lightly used, even to prevent the evil power of the will over weak persons.

Diseases of the will, greatly weakening the power of resistance in the afflicted, make them easy victims of all sorts of scoundrels, and if these sufferers can be strengthened, as Liegeois says is possible, by hypnotic suggestion, a discovery of incalculable benefit has been made. Crime, disease, suffering and death are so largely the result of defective nerve force and will power that any light on the treatment of nerve weakness is a great blessing. Prevention through hypnotic suggestion might lead to actual lengthening of life and renewal of youth.

To Khartoum Direct by Mail.

According to a Cairo correspondent, a Khedival decree has been issued sanctioning the extension of the railway to Wady Halfa. Thus two years hence travelers can reach Khartoum direct from Alexandria in sixty hours. At present there is railway communication from Cairo to Assouan, a distance of 547 miles. The distance from Assouan to Wady Halfa—the intervening country to be covered by railway—is about 230 miles. Wady Halfa and Khartoum are already joined by rail.

Wives usually stand by husbands who are in trouble, but down in the bottom of their hearts they believe them to be guilty.

A good many women carry amiability too far.

Wanted to Broaden Him.

Charles B. Hanford while playing in a Texas town was approached by a young man in typical cowboy fashion, who said:

"Are you the manager of this play that comes tonight?"

Mr. Hanford said he was.

"Do you want to hire a man to help act?"

"No. My company is complete."

"Want to hire a man to help count money?"

"No."

"Want to hire a man to get out in the back of the theater and holler and applaud?"

"Not this tour. The audiences are attending to that very satisfactorily."

"Want anybody for anything on earth?"

"Not that I think of at present."

"Well, that's just our luck. We've got a man here who recites pieces in consideration of being treated. If he doesn't get treated, he'll hang around and make the barroom unpleasant for hours. We don't want to hurt him, for he's a good sort in the main. But he only knows three pieces—Mark Antony's oration, Hamlet's soliloquy and Rienzi's address to the Romans. We thought that if you could flatter his mind into the belief that he's a great genius and haul him around the country two or three trips, so that he can learn a few new pieces from you, we'd be willing to make up a purse that would come mighty near making it worth while."—New York Telegram.

Too Much For the Cab.

One of the wealthiest wine merchants in Paris and also one of its stoutest citizens was the hero of an episode which caused much laughter in the Rue Princesse.

M. R., the corpulent man, hailed a cab, which came along side the curb. He opened the door and getting a purchase on the railing of "cabby's" seat, tried to hoist himself in.

But his weight was too much for the vehicle, which careered over and, as the sidewalk is very narrow, crashed into a window of a printing office. M. R. had meanwhile collapsed on the ground, and "cabby" by a miracle clung to his uncertain perch.

Then followed a stormy period. The printer came out and wanted to have the price of his broken window, the fat man tried to get the cabby to drive him away, and cabby refused to take any such load on board.

Finally all parties adjourned to the police station, where the difficulty was straightened out, and M. R. set to work looking for another cab.—Paris Temps.

MRS. PARCE'S STORY

HER TROUBLE MADE HER AFRAID TO RETIRE AT NIGHT.

Nervousness, the Disease that Wrecks the Happiness of so Many Women, Conquered at Last.

No incident of the many that are daily brought to public attention is of greater human interest than that which enters about Ellen Parce, the wife of Mr. David F. Parce, of No. 4 Spruce St., Binghamton, N. Y. The story is told by Mrs. Parce as follows:

"It was two years ago this summer that I was in a miserable condition as the result of hard work. I was completely run down, pale and losing flesh, and so nervous that I could not sleep or even get rest. It was dreadful to go to bed at night all worn out and lie awake for hours with nervousness. If I did fall asleep it was to wake up in the morning as tired as when I went to bed.

"My head troubled me a great deal, too, both with pain and dizziness. If I stooped over at any time I would be so dizzy I could hardly see or keep from falling down. I was troubled somewhat with indigestion at this time, but the nervousness was the greater trouble. If I became a little excited my hands would shake so I could hardly hold anything in them. I felt that something must be done so I employed our best physicians. They did all they could for me and although I obtained some benefit from their treatment, not one of them did me any permanent good.

"I had, of course, read of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People but had never taken any of them till a friend recommended them to me so strongly that I got some and before the first box was used up I began to feel that they were doing me good. I kept on taking them according to directions and get from them the only real, permanent benefit I have had from any remedy. It did seem so good to get a night's sleep and to be refreshed by it.

I am a firm believer in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and recommend them to all my friends. I generally keep a box in the house to take in case I feel a little run down."

Emerson's Last Lecture.

In his "Eccentricities of Genius" Major Pond tells the pathetic story of Ralph Waldo Emerson's last lecture, delivered in the Old South church in Boston for the fund to save that building from demolition:

"As he began reading his lecture the audience was very attentive. After a few moments he lost his place, and his granddaughter, sitting in the front row of seats, gently stepped toward him and reminded him that he was lecturing. He saw at once that he was wandering, and, with the most charming, characteristic, apologetic bow, he resumed his place, an incident that seemed to affect the audience more than anything else that could possibly have occurred. A few moments later he took a piece of manuscript in his hand and, turning around with it, laid it on a side table. Just then one of the audience said to me (I think it was Mrs. Livermore or Mr. Howe), 'Please have the audience pass right out,' and, rushing up to Mr. Emerson, said, 'Thank you so much for that delightful lecture;' then, turning around, waved the audience to go out.

"He probably had been speaking about 15 minutes. The audience passed out, many of them in tears. It was one of the most pathetic sights I ever witnessed."

His Exact Words.

Interviewer—Alderman Swelhed, I have come to get your views on the proposed change in the curriculum of the grammar school.

Alderman Swelhed—Curriculum! What's that? I'm ag'in it, whatever it is.

Alderman Swelhed, reading the report of the interviewer next morning: "Our distinguished townsman, Mr. M. T. Swelhed, was found at his charming home, surrounded by abundant indication of ripe scholarship and sturdy common sense. In reply to our reporter's question he said:

"'I do not desire to force my opinions upon the public, but this I will say, that I have given to this question long and studious attention, incidentally examining into the curricula of institutions of learning both at home and abroad, and, although I find in the existing course of study not a few matters for condemnation, still, upon the whole, I cannot say that I should advise any radical change until I have further time to examine into the subject.'"

"By George, that feller's got my exact language, word for word! And he didn't take no notes neither! By George, what a memory that feller must have!"—Tit-Bits.

Small Change.

"You know, I feel just like a counterfeit bill," observed a young man to a friend with whom he was walking, stopping in front of a barroom.

"Why?" queried his partner.

"I cannot pass," the other explained, waving his hand toward the entrance of the place.

"Oh," remarked his friend, "don't let that feeling worry you. You know, I'm somewhat accustomed to shoving the queer." And he took the man with a thirst by the arm and carried him on down the street.—Memphis Scimitar.

She Knew.

A clergyman while catechising his Sunday school had occasion to ask the children the meaning of the word "epistle." A little girl in the youngest class was so certain that she knew that she did not hesitate a minute, but, with the greatest of confidence, answered, "An epistle is the wife of an apostle."—New York Sun.

The Star.

"Now," we asked him, "who should be considered the star of your company?"

"The bloodhound, me boy, the bloodhound," said the gentleman that played Legree. "He has something to eat every day, whether the rest do or not."

Fear of the Dead.

Fear of the dead is instinctive in man. There is no doubt about that. I do not profess to be able to enter into the exact reasons for that fear; whether it be that man instinctively recoils from contemplation of the fallen temple alone or what not, it is sufficient that the fear exists.

Neither is this instinctive fear of the dead confined to man. I owned a horse once that could never be driven past a dead horse. The animal exhibited all the signs of true fear.

Fear coupled with shock can produce insanity. I do not think that the reason of a normal man would be unseated if he were locked up alone with a corpse for many hours, though a person with weak nerves certainly might be so affected. If a man discovered that his sweetheart had died suddenly while alone with him, the shock might render him insane.

Even to those most familiar with death and dead bodies there is something awe inspiring about a corpse, and no man's nerves are proof against a fright. I remember once, when I was alone in the dissecting room at night, the hand of the subject upon which I was engaged became loosened. I did not notice what had happened. Suddenly the arm of the subject swung around, and the hand struck the side of my face. Years of training in immunity from superstition vanished in the jump that I gave.—Dr. John D. Quackenbos in New York World.

Watches That They Lend.

"They are all alike," remarked a man coming out of a Woodward avenue watchmaker's, accompanied by a lady.

"Who?" inquired his wife.

"Watchmakers."

"How?"

"I thought other cities maybe weren't quite like our small town in the wild and wicked west, but they are and more so. I take my watch, which, as you know, is a fine gold one, full jeweled, costing $300, in to have a few repairs, much or little, as may be, and the boss timekeeper gives me an old battered tin watch to carry in its place that makes me ashamed to look into the face of a reputable watch for weeks. In addition it excites suspicion in the minds of my nearest friends when they see me take it out, and if I should die with that watch on my person in a strange country the newspapers would say, 'Judging from the watch found on the deceased, he must have come from New Jersey.' Now, what I want to know is why don't jewelers have 'substitute watches' to match their customers'? That is to say, let the customer's watch left for repairs determine the kind of watch he is to carry until he gets his own again."

But his wife couldn't tell him to save her life.—Detroit Free Press.

Proposed Alliance With England.

If the United States and England should form an alliance, the combined strength would be so great that there would be little chance for enemies to overcome us. In a like manner, when men and women keep up their bodily strength with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, there is little chance of attacks from disease. Surface Indications.

From "A Book on Dartmoor," written by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, comes a story which might have come from a less trustworthy source:

The wild and romantic country of Dartmoor consists of a tableland with rugged peaks or tors and all but impassable marshes. After a dry summer it is easy to pick one's way across parts of it which at other times are full of pitfalls. At one of the latter periods a man was cautiously treading his way across one of the treacherous marshes when he saw a hat lying brim downward on the sedge. He gave it a gentle, good humored kick in passing and almost jumped out of his skin when a choked voice called out from beneath:

"What be you a-doin to my 'at?"

"Be there now a chap under'n?" exclaimed the traveler.

"Ees, I reckon, and a hoss under me likewise."

UNITED STATES SENATOR ROACH

(Says: Peruna has greatly helped me in strength, vigor and appetite.)

Hon. W. N. Roach, U. S. Senator from North Dakota, in a letter written from Larimore, North Dakota, says:

U. S. Senator Roach, of North Dakota.

"Persuaded by a friend I have used Peruna as a tonic, and am glad to testify that it has greatly helped me in strength, vigor and appetite. I have been advised by friends that it is remarkably efficacious as a cure for the almost universal complaint of catarrh."

Never before in the history of medicine has any remedy received so many endorsements from people of national importance, as Peruna.

The explanation of this remarkable circumstance can only be found by a glance at the history of Peruna.

In the first place, it should be noted that catarrh is one of the most prevalent and universal maladies known to medical science. Nearly everybody has catarrh in some degree or phase.

In the second place, it should be noted that Peruna is the only scientific, internal catarrh remedy yet devised.

This explains the almost universal use of Peruna. Everybody uses Peruna, high and low, rich and poor, great and small. Peruna has fought its way out from among the host of catarrh remedies, and stands unique and alone today as the catarrh remedy par excellence. By its well-earned merits it has attracted the attention of the greatest, and the busiest, and the wisest people. It is equally applicable to all ages, to both sexes, and to every climate.

Nothing in the history of medicine has ever equaled the growth of this remarkable remedy. Catarrh has become a national disease. Peruna has become a national remedy. Dr. Hartman, the inventor of Peruna, has become the best-known physician in the United States.

All this is explained by the fact that Peruna cures catarrh wherever located. Catarrh is liable to attack any organ of the human body. Catarrh is not a local disease but a systemic disease. Peruna is not a local remedy, but a systemic remedy. Peruna cures catarrh by eradicating it from the system.

Such cures are not temporary but permanent.

If you do not derive prompt and satisfactory results from the use of Peruna, write at once to Dr. Hartman, giving a full statement of your case and he will be pleased to give you his valuable advice gratis.

An Englishman thus describes the wife of his bosom in his will:

"Heaven seems to have sent her into the world solely to drive me out of it. WHEN LOVE WENT BY.

When Love went by I scarcely bent
My eyes to see which way he went.
Life had so many joys to show,
What time had I to watch him go,
Or bid him in, whom folly sent?

But when the day was well nigh spent,
From out the casement long I leant.
Ah, would I had been watching so
When Love went by!

Gray days with dismal nights are blent,
Lonely and sad and discontent;
I would his feet had been more slow.
Oh, heart of mine, how could we know
Or realize what passing meant
When Love went by?
—Woman's Home Companion.

THE YELLOW KITTEN

"IT was the yellow kitten who did it," Miss Priscilla Price said at the church social in her most positive manner, and no one, not even Mrs. 'Lias Miller, pretended to contradict her.

"It's the truth, indeed," Mrs. Sarah Crump agreed, with her fat, comfortable chuckle, and the society in a body responded, "That's so."

Yes, the yellow kitten was responsible for the wedding that was to come off to-morrow and that would thus unite forever not only two very attractive young people, but also the well-known families of Price and Campbell.

But we have begun at the wrong end of the story, for Miss Priscilla ought to have made, and in fact did make the remark about the yellow kitten at the end of the narrative, and not at the beginning. And thus, to get things straight, we will start over again in the old-fashioned orthodox way.

Once upon a time (not so very long ago, either) the little village of Pineville flourished like a green bay tree. It is true it had not arrived at trolley cars or electric lights, but it was a very charming place to visit nevertheless. Bicycling was not entirely unheard of, though those who rode were scarce—a few visitors at the summer boarding house in the little hills just outside the village had introduced the wheel, but the most conservative Pinevillians, Miss Priscilla Price at the head, quite frowned down upon the sport, and Miss Rebecca Slow has said, in season and out of season, that "if any niece of hers so demeaned herself as to be guilty of such an unladylike, worldly amusement, she would be sorry, that's all," and then an expression of having already made a will would pass over her austere countenance.

But to the story! There were two prominent families in the village who had lived there since the very existence of the settlement, and with whom all the best people craved to be connected in some way. They were the Campbells and the Prices, and Miss Priscilla, who insists upon getting into print just as if she were a heroine, was one of the most respected members of the latter tribe. As it has been hinted before, this is an old-fashioned story, and has a genuine heroine, to wit, Mabel Campbell. Of course, there is a hero, too, whom the girls said "was just too sweet to live," and their mothers declared that he was a perfectly safe young man, while the fathers and brothers, though not going quite so far, had only good words to say of Charlie Price, at your service.

Now the "gentle reader" or, as some writers prefer to say, the "fair reader," has doubtless guessed the sequel. Charlie was in love with Mabel, and the wedding, though properly opposed by the powers that were, was a natural consequence. But where or when did the yellow kitten come in? All in good time, my friends.

The Campbells and the Prices had a feud of long standing, originating in the years gone by over the fence boundary, each head of the family claiming twelve feet more of ground than the other considered his due. Fortunately this feud was conducted in a quiet and perfectly lawful manner, and poison, bowie knives and pistols did not figure in it. But the feud was a positive one, notwithstanding. No Campbell or Price had ever been known to shake hands, not even at a church social, which Mrs. 'Lias Miller and Miss Rebecca Slow denounced far and wide as "onChristianlike." But in spite of the disapproval of many of their common friends, there was apparently no chance of any of the members making up until—well, just before this story was written.

The places adjoined, as the disputed boundary line suggested; in fact the whole village had grown up around them, and what was once an old country lane where their gates stood, was now a smart village street.

As children, our hero and heroine had several times displayed much contempt for the family fuss, and had been seen playing together, though often forcibly separated by indignant parents with threats of being sent supperless to bed if the offense was repeated. Evidently they had inherited none of the ill feeling of their ancestors, which was mighty unnatural, Miss Priscilla thought, though, as she always said, she blamed the mothers on both sides who certainly had not inculcated the proper spirit of righteous resentment and unappeased wrath in their offspring.

But when childhood was over, Mabel Campbell was estranged by circumstance from Charlie Price as completely as if an ocean had been between them instead of a paling fence. When she was 18 she came back from boarding school and was pronounced old enough for picnics and socials, and was, indeed, the acknowledged belle of the Young People's Pleasure Club, and the favorite even of matrons and spinsters at sewing bees and Dorcas societies, and a perfect idol at home. She was an only child, and the love that seemed to overflow from father and mother was expended upon innumerable pets. She had two fat Yorkshire puppies, a pug dog, a parrot, and a cat who recently had added to the procession a yellow kitten, of the story. This small animal was up to mischief of all kinds, and had the most exploring turn of mind, for she was forever getting lost and being returned to her mistress by little boys of the village, who thus turned many an honest penny.

One afternoon Mabel had been out in the woods with her young friends hunting for chestnuts, and on her return was greted with the sad tidings that the yellow kitten had again strayed from home. A search throughout the place was at once begun. Evening came on, however, and no yellow kitten put in an appearance. Mabel became much distressed, as she was sure that an evil fate had at last overtaken her pet. She begged to be allowed to send over to the Prices, and see if the wanderer, scorning old opinions, had found her way there, but her parents would not consider such a proposition, so for that night the household was minus the kitten.

The next day was spent in looking for the loved though lost, and many of the village boys joined in the hunt, but with no result.

Toward sunset Mabel decided to walk through the woods that skirted the village, thinking possibly her little prodigal might be somewhere about, and down a shady path she went. She fancied ere long that she heard a moan—a very sad, kittenly moan it was—and soon discovered up in a tree, tangled most promiscuously in creeping vines, the yellow kitten, unable to free herself. In vain Mabel called and tried to entice her from her perilous position; only piteous little meows were the result. If she only had a long stick, or, still better, if she could climb the tree, something might be done, but the years spent at boarding school had robbed her of all her childish accomplishments.

In the midst of her dilemma, help was forthcoming she little dreamed of. Through the bushes she heard the sound of approaching footsteps and a cheerful whistle. Soon the author of these pleasant noises was in view. It was Charlie Price, the family enemy, and, to boot, a splendid young athlete! Mabel forgot the traditions of three generations of bitterness and called out to her playmate of former days: "Charlie—Mr. Price, I mean—can you help me? See my poor yellow kitten; she cannot get down," pointing, as she spoke, to the tree which contained her treasure.

"With pleasure, Miss Mabel! Beg pardon, Miss Campbell. Poor little beastie—she is caught in the vine." And with that he sprung up the tree with the agility of a squirrel or a circus rider, and at some peril of broken limbs rescued the kitten and placed her in the outstretched arms of her young mistress.

Then it was the most natural thing in the world for our hero to walk home with our heroine, and still more natural the next day when they by chance met in the same woods, to stop and speak of the lost one. Thus, in spite of the family feud, the intimacy ripened between the young branches.

It was useless for Mabel's parents to protest; indeed, nothing short of a command would have stopped this new and delightful friendship, and Charlie boldly announced to his paternal that he was tired of keeping up such an antiquated fuss; let the grandfathers fight out their own battles in whatever world they were now residing, but he, for his part would no longer encourage hatred, malice and all uncharitableness.

Ere the winter had advanced Charlie Price was known throughout Pineville to be Mabel Campbell's "steady company," and although Miss Priscilla, at the head of the Price family, and old Mr. Jonas Campbell, Mabel's great uncle, the chief of the Campbell tribe, declared in unmeasured language their opinion of the doings of their young relatives, it was useless, and, in fact, hurried up matters. Then the two mothers, who secretly bore no malice, exchanged calls, and actually Mrs. Campbell was overheard to say that Mrs. Price's sausage receipt was the best in the village, while Mrs. Price made no denial of having borrowed Mrs. Campbell's knit quilt as a guide for the one she was making to exhibit at the county fair in the spring.

From that the fathers of the two peacemakers met and discussed politics, and not boundary lines over the disputed fence. By this time, as may well be imagined, the wedding preparations were well under way. At the suggestion of Charlie his new house was to be built directly over the part of the ground that both Campbells and Prices claimed, and this was universally regarded as the most amicable settlement of the trouble, and lo and behold! the marriage was announced to take place on the following Easter Tuesday.

And just then did Miss Priscilla Price make her statement that the yellow kitten did it, and the entire village agreed with her.

SENATOR STEWART HAS NEVER BEEN SHAVED.

Senator Stewart of Nevada, who is the proud possessor of the most luxuriant growth of whiskers in the Senate, has never been shaved in his life. His beard began to sprout when he was about 16, and he is now 75. "Oh, yes," said he the other day, "I have often thought of shaving. Kind-hearted friends have given me razors and advised me to go to work on my beard, but I never took their advice. You see, when I was a young man I never owned a razor, and I had to let my whiskers run wild. Now it is too late. My constituents would rage and my political career would be wrecked."

"BONA-FIDE AMERICAN."

Dr. William Mason Tells an Anecdote of the Violinist Remenyi.

"I have already had something to say of Eduard Remenyi, the Hungarian violinist who accompanied Brahms to Weimar in 1853, says a writer in the Century. He was a talented man and was esteemed by Liszt as being, in his way, a good violinist. He belonged to the class typified by Ole Bull, but did not achieve so great a reputation. He remained at Weimar after Brahms left there, and I became intimately acquainted with him. He was very entertaining and so full of fun that he would have made a tip-top Irishman. He was at home in the gypsy music of his own country and this was the main characteristics of his playing. He had also a fad for playing Schubert melodies on the violin with the most attenuated pianissimo effects and occasionally his hearers would listen intently after the tone had ceased, imagining that they still heard a trace of it.

Not long before leaving Weimar I had some fun with him by asking if he had ever heard "any bona-fide American spoken." He replied that he did not know there was such a language. "Well," said I, "listen to this for a specimen: 'Ching-a-ling-a-dardee, Chebung cum Susan.'" I did not meet him again until 1878, twenty-four years after leaving Weimar. I was going upstairs to my studio in the Steinway Building when some one told me that Remenyi had arrived and was rehearsing for his concert in one of the rooms above. So, going up, I followed the sounds of the violin, gave a quick knock, opened the door and went in. Remenyi looked at me for a moment, rushed forward and seized my hand, and as he wrung it cried out: "Ching-a-ling-a-dardee, Chebung cum Susan!" He had remembered it all those years.

Referring to the Murray Hall case, Dr. Mary Walker of "bloomer" fame said: "I think it an outrage that they buried that poor woman in skirts. She had worn men's clothing all her life, because she liked them, and she should have been buried in them. If anybody tries to put skirts on me after I'm dead I'll haunt them."

There is no accounting for what may occur in Paris. Recently a fat baker there appeared in court to have a woman fined for keeping a rabid dog, which he claimed had bit him, inoculating him with rabies. When he was through with his complaint, the woman put the dog on the judge's desk and removed from its mouth a set of false teeth.

Referring to Richard le Gallienne's lecture on "Old Omar" at St. Paul, the Pioneer Press made this observation: "It contained no 'useful information.' It impressed no moral maxims. It defended no political party. It advocated no religious creed. It was without statistics, anecdotes, formal jokes. It was even destitute of slide pictures."

The following brief account is given of the old newspaper published at Northampton, England, which is one of the oldest in Europe: It was started in 1720, and has never from that year to the present been interrupted for a single week. The interesting history of this newspaper, the Northampton Mercury, is now issued in book form by the proprietors.

According to an item from Berlin, Germany's pig iron output for 1900 was 8,422,842 tons, an increase of 393,537 tons for the preceding year. The December output was 780,790 tons. Official returns of the German foreign trade for 1900 show the imports to be 5,833,312,000 marks, an increase over 1899 of 50,084,000 marks, and the exports 4,555,291,000 marks, an increase of 186,282,000 marks over the previous year, largely agricultural products.

Dr. Hoff's claim of having made a discovery whereby consumption may be cured has been scoffed at by the profession. This leads the New York Journal to say: "Of all the history-making that is going on in various quarters of the world, none may turn out so important as that which is under way in a modest doctor's office in Vienna, where the Journal's patient, Hammann, is under treatment for consumption. If Dr. Hoff can rout the disease, as he seems to be doing, he will be better known 500 years hence than Lord Roberts."

SEES WONDERS OF WYOMING.

College Professors Have an Opportunity to Enlarge Their Learning.

It will be remembered that last year E. L. Lomax, general passenger agent of the Union Pacific railroad, invited every university, college and museum in the country to accept a free pass for a professor and one or two assistants over his road from Chicago to Laramie, Wyo., and return, so that they might visit the great fossil fields of that state, collect specimens and study geology. Nearly 100 scientific men were able to avail themselves of this opportunity. Professor Knight of the University of Wyoming has recently written an account of this expedition's work in the field.

For about thirty years Wyoming has been regarded as the most attractive field in the world for the study of vertebrate remains. Many of the rarest and most valuable specimens known to science have been found in this field. It was here that Professor Marsh of Yale university secured his largest dinosaurs, which not only made him famous, but gave Wyoming the distinction of possessing geological graveyards containing fossil remains of the largest land animals that have ever inhabited the earth.

On July 21 last year the wagon train carrying the camp equipment, the culinary supplies and the geologists started across the Laramie plains for the fossil beds. On the second day's march some fossiliferous bands of sandstone were reached, camp was pitched and every man armed himself with pick, ax, hammer shovel and sack and hurried for the bluff, where invertebrate fossils were found in abundance. In a short time the face of the bluff was nearly covered with collectors, and chips and fragments of stone were flying in all directions, so that it was almost unsafe to remain in the neighborhood. The men labored long and hard, and while most of them returned to supper, some became so enthusiastic as to forget their meal until darkness compelled them to go back to camp.

By the fifth day out the expedition, which had been on the march every day except Sunday, had collected two tons of fossil, chiefly invertebrates and fossil leaves. On the arrival of the expedition at Como bluff, rendered famous by the work of Professor Marsh, enthusiasm was unbounded. It was from this locality that Yale university received its largest amount of dinosaur material.

The bluff rises to a height of 200 to 300 feet and parallels the Union Pacific railroad for five or six miles within a half mile of the track. The bluff is capped with conglomerate rock, just below which are the dinosaur beds plainly visible from passing trains. The members of the expedition succeeded in finding a great many dinosaur bones and some open quarries that gave promise of being very valuable.

Still futher on the expedition reached Freezeout hills, which is a new locality for dinosaur collecting. Here the geologists and paleontologist found unbounded opportunities. This being a comparatively new field and the dinosaur beds being exposed for a distance of ten miles on each side of the camp, dinosaur hunting was the order of the day. Long before sunset on the first day's work at this place men were returning to camp from every direction loaded down with bones; others were seeking teams to haul heavy loads to camp, and though they worked diligently it was nearly 10 o'clock at night before the last load of fossils was brought in. The next day's work unearthed a still larger quantity, the entire shipment from this point amounting to several tons.

So the work went on day after day until after thirty-nine days in the field the expedition returned to Laramie all well and in the best of spirits. No accident had occurred and large collections were made. The results of the work done have enriched many museums and will furnish topics for numerous articles in the scientific journals.—New York Sun.

Red Tape.

Some of the absurdities of officialism have perhaps never been better illustrated than by an incident in the career of Lord Shaftesbury, given in "Collections and Recollections."

One winter evening in 1867 he was sitting in his library in Grosvenor Square, when the servant told him there was a poor man waiting to see him. The man was shown in and proved to be a laborer from Clerkenwell, and one of the innumerable recipients of the old earl's charity.

He said: "My lord, you have been very good to me, and I have come to tell you what I have heard." It appeared that at the public house which he frequented he had overheard some Irishmen of desperate character plotting to blow up Clerkenwell prison. He gave Lord Shaftesbury the information to be used as he thought best, but made it a condition that his name should not be divulged. If it were, his life would not be worth an hour's purchase.

Lord Shaftesbury pledged himself to secrecy, ordered his carriage, and drove instantly to Whitehall. The authorities there refused, on ground of official practice, to entertain the information without the name and address of the informant. These, of course, could not be given. The warning was rejected and the jail was blown up.

An Old New Jersey Schoolhouse.

The pupil of to-day would think his opportunities very great if he could see the school equipment of a hundred years ago. A Morris County, New Jersey, school of that period is thus described in an old letter of one of its attendants:

The building was constructed of logs, and instead of glass for windows, sheepskins were stretched over the apertures made by sawing off an occasional log. The windows had one merit—they prevented pupils from being interrupted in their study by what was going on outside. The time was regulated by an hour-glass, and the pupils drank water from a tumbler made of a cow's horn, or from a ground shell.

In spite of these differences of equipment, the schools of a century ago resembled those of to-day in one notable respect; they had for the most part the same great literary works that are the standards of our language now. The greatest literature is fortunately the possession of many centuries.

"AUTO" FOR FARMS.

W. F. Crowley Invents a Machine Likely to Supplant the Horse.

City people are not to enjoy a monopoly of the festive automobile in the future. A novel kind of "auto" is about to invade the agricultural field, where, according to its inventor, it will speedily supplant the horse for farm work. The machine referred to is the invention of William F. Crowley, of Holly, Powers County, Col., and, it is said, will do the work of several teams of horses. After long study and many experiments, Mr. Crowley says he has solved the problem of the substitution of mechanical power for that of horses in farm work.

The motive power for this machine may be either gasoline or electricity, although it is expected that gasoline will be more commonly used.

It is adapted to plowing, cultivating, seed-planting or harvesting. The engine or motor is on the forward or drive wheels, which are joined by a long reach to the smaller rear wheels, over which the seat of the driver is placed. A large transverse bar, about six feet in length, crosses the reach bar at its center. To this transverse bar the plowing, cultivating, and other appliances for farm work may be attached. A very important feature of the invention is a mechanism that allows the operator to apply the whole power to any one of the wheels, thus making it easy to get the wheels out of any rut or hole in which they may get stuck. The wheels may be operated entirely independent of each other and by an ingenious steering device the farm "auto" can be turned within a very small compass.

It is said that it will do satisfactory work on rough and hilly ground. According to the inventor, a fifteen-horse-power machine can be operated at an expense of 75 cents a day.

A rotating plow has been invented by Mr. Crowley, to be used with the machine, which he says is a great improvement on the old plow. The plow, while it does not offer so much resistance to the earth, turns it up very thoroughly and has a trip beam attached that raises the plow points out of danger whenever a stone is struck.

NOVEL AUTOMOBILE PLOW, SOWER AND HARVESTER.

HAD NO TERRORS FOR HIM.

Seasickness Did Not Trouble the Lunch-Room Conversationalist.

"Queer, isn't it," remarked the Lunch Room Conversationalist, "how reluctant some folks are to admit that they have ever been victims of seasickness?"

"Nope," remarked the other four at the table, glowering.

"Yes, siree," went on the Lunch Room Conversationalist, "you will only find about one person in a thousand who will freely admit having been sick after having completed an ocean voyage. There's nothing disgraceful about it that I ever could see, but most folks seem to think that they'd be assisting in the smirching of their own characters if they owned up to mal de mer. Peculiar phase of human nature, hey?"

"It is not," remarked the other four in unison.

"Now, I took my first ocean voyage last week," continued the Lunch Room Conversationalist, ignoring the obvious lack of interest of the other four. "When with my wife on a little coastwise trip from Baltimore to New York. She didn't want to take the trip, being, as she said, deathly afraid of getting seasick. She had never been to sea before, either. As for me, I wasn't a bit afraid of getting seasick, and I confidently boasted that the mountainous seas had never yet reared their heads that could put me under the weather even a little bit. You see, I've a pretty strong sort of constitution, and I figured on that to keep me from suffering from seasickness, not knowing then, as I do now, that the most robust folks in the world have to succumb to the nauseating illness that comes to novices in heavy weather at sea.

"Well, my wife was pretty skeptical about my not getting sick—you know how women are in these matters—but I stuck to it that I didn't intend to let any old sea get me under and suffer tortures from seasickness, but, as I had passes for the voyage and she didn't want them to lapse for want of using—you know how women like to get their money's worth in these affairs—she consented to go along.

"Now, it's certainly queer how some things come out. We were both on the deck of the steamer all the way down the Chesapeake from Baltimore, both feeling as comfortable as bugs in rugs and nary a sign of seasickness. Passing out between the two capes, however, we struck the long ocean swell, and then——"

The other four at the table grinned at each other.

"Then you went down below and sought your bunk, feeling as limp as a rubber door mat, hey?" suggested No. 1.

"And your chestiness was wiped out before the boat had been rolling and pitching for two consecutive minutes, I s'pose?" put in No. 2.

"And your wife had the merry, rippling laugh on you, all right?" cut in No. 3.

"And while you were sick and groaning to be heaved overboard, she was as chipper as a lark, no doubt?" said No. 4.

"Not on your prophetic visions!" calmly remarked the Lunch Room Conversationalist, drawing with his eye an accurate bee line for the door. "When the boat began to pitch in the swell I got as hungry as a wolf and went to the galley and had the cook fix me up three portions of bacon and eggs, two tall stacks of wheat cakes and about half a gallon o' coffee. I didn't have nary a qualm at any stage of the game, although we had heavy weather all the way up, while my wife had to turn in with the first little toss of the boat, and the way she did suffer until we warped into the dock in New York was sure a cau——"

He escaped the flying glass and crockeryware by dodging out the side door after leading them to suppose that he was going to escape by the front way.—Washington Post.

Sneeze Without Winking.

Bobby came home one day covered with dirt and bruises and trundling a broken bicycle.

"What on earth have you been doing, my child?" exclaimed his terrified mother.

"I ran over a big dog and took a fall," explained Bobby.

"Couldn't you see him and give him the road?"

"Yes; I saw him and was turning out, but when I got within about ten feet of him I shut my eyes, and before I got 'em open again I'd run into him."

"For the land's sake, what did you shut your eyes for?"

"Couldn't help it. Had to sneeze. If you think you can hold your eyes open when sneeze comes, you just try it some day."

If the reader thinks Bobby's excuse was not a valid one, let him try it some day "when the sneeze comes."—Youth's Companion.

American Mottoes.

A soldier in the Philippines writes home that he has seen some strange sights, and gives the following instance. We borrow it from Golden Days.

A crowd of soldiers attended a church service in their honor, and there was much praying and singing, but the soldiers were chiefly interested in looking at the image of a saint. Above the image was the picture of an eagle, and on the banner which streamed from the eagle's bill was the following legend:

"The Old Reliable Condensed Milk."

The saint had been decorated in honor of the visiting Americans, and the artist had copied the eagle and accompanying inscription from a milk can. He afterward explained that he thought it an American motto, as it was under the eagle.

The Woodpecker.

Woodpeckers which were long considered fair game for the gunner are now recognized almost everywhere as useful birds. The flicker is so fond of ants that it will alight on an ant hill, thrust in its bill to bring out the inmates, and then gorge itself on the agitated ants as they swarm from the opening. The sapsucker was considered an injurious bird for many years, but Frank Bolles showed that its tapping trees ordinarily produced no serious injury; indeed, it is now claimed that the bird's eye formation in the wood of the maple, which increases its value, is the work of these birds. Woodpeckers are deserving all that they can ask at the hands of farmers. The downy woodpecker feeds upon the woolly aphis, often seen on our apple trees.

Will by Phonograph.

A wealthy engineer recently talked his last will and testament into a phonograph. Then with a hot copper wire he signed his name on the wax roll of the phonograph, the witnesses doing likewise, and the "document" was thereupon completed.

A Good Apple Crop.

It is reported that the apple crop in Baden, Germany, was so abundant that the assistance of soldiers had to be asked for its harvesting.

SUMMER SESSION OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA.

There will be a truly remarkable array of scholars in the faculty of the approaching Summer Session of the University of California, from June 28 to August 7.

The Summer School, open without examination to all applicants of good character and intelligence, will number in its instructing staff thirty-five or more members of the regular faculty, including, among others, Professors Bacon, Hilgard, Wickson, Clapp, Gayley, Merrill, Margolis, Loughridge, Page, Jaffa, and Magee, and in addition John Dewey, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Chicago; H. Morse Stephens, Professor of Modern European and English History at Cornell University; Barrett Wendell, Professor of English in Harvard University; James E. Russell, Dean of Teachers' College of Columbia University; Liberty Hyde Bailey, Professor of Horticulture at Cornell; Ewald Flugel, Professor of English Philology at Stanford; Ellwood Cubberley, Associate Professor of Education in the same institution, and James M. Wilson, Irrigation Expert of the United States Department of Agriculture.

Courses will be offered in philosophy, education, history and political science, Semitic, Greek, Latin, English, Spanish, mathematics, physics, astronomy, chemistry, botany, mineralogy, physical culture, agriculture, horticulture, and irrigation. All the facilities of the library, laboratories, and museums will be available.

Many of the courses are planned particularly to meet the needs of teachers, to acquaint them with modern methods, and to freshen their inspiration. Particularly valuable are the opportunities for training in pedagogy, nature study, laboratory methods, and physical culture.

The short course in agriculture, a new departure for California, will enable practical farmers to learn the latest facts and methods of scientific agriculture, through hearing lectures by experts on topics such as irrigation practice, plant disease, breeds and breeding, milk and its products, food for men and animals, fruit-growing, and soils. The agricultural students may choose also courses in other departments.

In climate Berkeley is the chosen land of the summer session. The nearness of the Pacific tempers the days and makes excessive heat practically unknown.

A five-minutes' walk from the University buildings leads one into a delightful wilderness of rugged hills and shady canyons and winding country roads. The region round about is a tempting field for long tramps and bicycle rides. And with all its out-of-door charm, the University lies in a pleasant town of 15,000 people, with ample and comfortable accommodations for students, with electric cars, and with all present-day comforts. San Francisco, with its shops and libraries, theatres, parks, deep-sea shipping, strange sights, and historic flavor, is only fifty minutes distant,—the fare ten cents.

A circular containing full information will be mailed free upon application to the Recorder of the Faculties, Berkeley, California. The fee for the session is $10, and the student may choose one or many courses. Applications for admission should be filed, if possible, by June 17.

The University of California is now second among American universities in number of undergraduates, and sixth in total enrollment. It is growing in numbers more rapidly than any other American university. During the past year the enrollment increased 12.5 per cent.; during the past eleven years, no less than fivefold. In last year's Summer Session 433 students were enrolled, more than in any other summer school in the United States save those of Harvard and Cornell.

Here and There.

The Rothchilds and Rockefellers control the world's copper.

Dewet, the intrepid leader of the Boer forces, is said to be insane.

The bubonic plague seems to have a firm grip on the old world countries.

King Oscar, of Norway and Sweden, will act as arbitrator in the Samoan affairs between the United States and Germany.

An engine jumped the track of the Pacific Coast line near Santa Barbara last Friday and the engineer, Elmer Ballou, and fireman, Charles Perry, were killed.

The first box of cherries was shipped from Vacaville to Chicago last Thursday, by Maury Robinson. They were consigned to the Porter Bros., company of Chicago.

In a collision between two street cars last Thursday in Sacramento, the 16-year old son of Superior Judge, E. C. Hart, had his left leg below the knee completely severed from his body.

R. C. Chambers, a prominent mining mining man, died in San Francisco last Thursday, after undergoing an operation for appendicitis. Mr. Chambers has mining interests in this county.

Through eastern Colorado and Wyoming two feet of snow fell on Wednesday last. It is feared that cold weather may set in and form a crust on the snow, which will make it impossible for cattle and sheep to graze on the ranges, and in that event serious losses of livestock may result.

"Say mamma, how much am I worth?"

"You are worth a million of dollars to me, my son."

"Say, mamma, couldn't you advance me twenty-five cents?"

JOHN J. MCLEAN, Observer.

*Record beginning March 6th 1898.

R. S. Miner, Esq., of Bridgeport, is visiting Lone Pine.

Supt. Squire came down from Mazourka canyon yeeterday afternoon.

District Attorney Dehv returned from a visit to Bishop Wednesday evening.

Miss Lizzie Thompson returned from a visit to Bishop friends Wednesday evening.

Howard Mairs took two drummers, Messrs. Jones and Wertheimer, to Bishop Wednesday.

Marshal Naylor has completed the Onion Valley wagon road nearly to the old Kearsarge mill.

Wells Barnes came in from his mine Thursday afternoon He reports the ledge as improving in size and value as depth is attained.

Jake Steininger was brought to the County Hospital last Wednesday, suffering from a fracture of the hip, caused by falling off the roof of his house.

Harry Meads passed through town yesterday with a 14-animal team loaded with wool en route to Mojave. He will bring back freight for our valley merchants.

"Who can tell what a baby thinks?" If its thoughts are half as bad as its efforts to express them, it is a providential mercy that they are concealed from human ken.

A story comes from the North of a woman freezing fast to the sidewalk in Dawson. Thus, even amid the snows of the Arctic, is found futher proof of the strength of woman's attachment.

Mr. Fred A. Hines, Secretary of the Mazourka M. & W. Co., and Fred Johnson, of the Hotel Westminster, who is a shareholder in the company, are expected to arrive here to-morrow morning from Los Angeles.

An editor lay dying, says the Arizona Kicker, and the doctor, leaning over him, remarked: "Circulation's nearly gone." The dying man, summoning all his energy, shouted: "You're a liar! We've got the largest circulation in the county."

George Naylor and Ivan Bunney, Forest Reserve Rangers, left Wednesday morning for the southern end of the county, where there are several bands of sheep. They will accompany the sheep through the county and see that they keep outside of the limits of the Forest Reserve.

The divers committees for the Odd Fellows' and Rebekahs' Ball are doing their utmost, and sparing no pains to make the dance on next Friday night April 26, a memorable occasion. Already it is assured that the large Pavilion will be taxed to its capacity to accommodate the large crowd who have signified their intention of being present.

Philip S. McLean, son of John J. McLean, left here on March 19th to attend the Ruskin College, at Trenton, Missouri arriving there March 26th. Intellectual and industrial education is the aim of the College. Each student has an opportunity to earn a living and gain an education at the same time. Philip has taken up a course in scientific farming.

The Ball Supper for the Odd Fellows' and Rebekahs' will be given at the Independence Hotel. As is usual, on like occasions at this hostelry, no pains or expense will be spared to make this one of unusual excellence. The chef has determined to maintain his reputation, and to place before the patrons a repast that will please the palate and tickle the fancy of epicures. Price, 50 cents per plate.

S. J. Osborn, an oil expert, was here during the week and visited the oil locations of Messrs. Roeper, Fausel and others. Mr. Osborn speaks in the highest terms of the indications, and had no hesitancy in declaring that our fellow townsmen had undoubtedly one of the best, and most flattering prospects he had visited in the State,—and he has visited all the oil fields of an prominence.

Will Sink a Well.

W. H. Adams and F. J. Syvertson returned to-day from the Owens Lake country in Inyo county. They report finding fine surface indications of white oil. Many prospectors are in the field, and lands adjoining and south of the lake are eagerly sought for. The entire valley south of the lake for a distance of over twenty miles has already been "located" for oil. The Adams Oil Company, incorporated a few days ago, owns about 7000 acres in that field. They are highly pleased with the prospects and propose to sink a well and prove the district at an early date.—S. F. Bulletin.

SPORTSMEN'S PARADISE.

Beautiful Scenery and Plenty of Game of all Varieties to be Found in Inyo County.

[Los Angeles Times.]

I desire to call attention to the many natural resorts that Inyo county possesses. Independence, the county seat, is situated in Owens River Valley, at an altitude of 4000 feet. The summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, 12,000 feet high, can be reached in eight miles from the foothills. It is six miles from the town to the foothills and six miles from there to one of the best camping places in the whole Sierra Nevada Range, called Onion Valley; seen from this valley, within a radius of seven miles, are fifteen lakes, all stocked with trout; from the valley it is two miles to the first lake, called Kitchen Lake; 300 yards from there is Flower Lake; south of that a mile is Matlack Lake; 200 feet from Matlack Lake is Slim Lake, and less than a quarter of a mile from Slim Lake is another lake, name unknown. North of Onion Valley is another lake, and east of the summit is a pond called the Devil's Pot Hole. All of the lakes mentioned empty into Independence Creek. When the summit is reached, going west, there is University Lake, named by the young men of the University of California, who first discovered it; below this but a short distance, is Bullfrog Lake, and three miles from that is Lake Rhoda. Around all of these waters are good camping grounds, feed more than enough for saddle and pack animals, plenty of fuel and timber. The lakes are all connected by small streams from a half to a mile in length, and there is as good fishing in the streams as in the Lakes. Onion Valley, the first camping ground mentioned, is 9600 feet above sea level; most of the lakes are about 10,400 feet above the sea level. Besides the trout, there is an abundance of game Within three or four miles of the several camping grounds are mountain sheep, deer and mountain quail, and plenty of grouse in the heavy timber.

During the entire summer heavy snow banks exist within 200 yards of all the camping grounds. After the lakes are left on the west of the summit of the mountain, the trail strikes what is known as Bubb's Creek, six miles from Kings River. From Kings River it is six miles to Fox's station, and from Fox's station it is thirty miles, going through Gen. Grant Park to Millwood and Sequoia Mills, where are the big trees so well advertised. This entire distance, from Independence foothills to Sequoia, more than forty miles, is over one range after another of the Sierra Nevadas. On the South Fork of Kings River is natural scenery that equals, if it does not excel, that of the Yosemite.

All the above is simply a statement of facts that can be verified by any one who desires to investigate.

The citizens of Independence will this spring build a wagon road to within two miles of the first lake, and make a good trail all of the way across the mountains

Some day the world beyond the borders of Nevada and California will hear more of Inyo county, its natural resorts, its snow-capped mountains, and its clear snow-water lakes, which will make it the resort of the world.

Think of looking behind you as do the people of Independence, and see the snowy Mount Whitney, Williamson and Fisherman's peaks, all of them more than two miles high, and all within a few miles of the trail herein described.

Some day the skilled sportsmen of the East will discover that here on the Sierra's eastern slope is a paradise for sportsmen.

GEORGE MONTGOMERY.

Deceptive Oil Indications.

A warning has been issued by State Mineralogist Cooper to prospectors who are misled by what appears to be surface indicates of oil seepages, but are only the discolorations made by iron in the earth through which the water comes. These counterfeit seepages appear in the form of an irridescent film over the surface of the water oozing from the ground or draining out of hillsides, and to the superficial observer simulate perfectly the appearance of high grade oil. They can be identified by the following tests: Frst, lack of petroleum odor; second, instead of having substantial thickness they are found to consist of a mere film; third, when stirred they break into fragments instead of swirling about, as oil will do; fourth, when pieces of blotting paper are laid upon them so as to take them up, and the blotting paper is afterward put into a glass jar filled with water and shaken, the water will be colored a dull yellow brown. These seepages are really nothing but iron, and may merely indicate the presence of that element in a clay bank through which they have passed. It will be observed that the ground over which they lie will always be found to be coated with a yellow oxidation when they are removed.

Questions of Orthography.

Over at Durange last week the good ladies of the Methodist church contributed a supply of good things and proceeded with the same to the home of their pastor, Rev. C. E. Webb, to find that a bright baby boy had just preceded them to the parsonage.

The ladies concluded to stay and take supper with Mr. Webb, and therefore transferred the eatables from their baskets to the dining table and then informed the parson that supper was ready, wondering as they did so if in returning thanks he would remember their gifts.

When all were seated at the table, the good man bowed his head and thus approached the throne of grace: "O Lord, we thank Thee for this timely succor," and the ladies are still in doubt as to what he meant.—Glenwood Post.

Silas Reynolds left for Bishop Wednesday morning.

SKELETON FOUND.

Supposed to be the Remains of an Indian Who Has Been Missing for Over Two Years.

Last Sunday J. W. Wright, from the eight mile ranch, came into town and reported having found a skeleton of a human body in the black rocks north of his house. On Monday morning Justice of the Peace Davidson had a Coroner's Jury summoned to investigate.

The jury went out to the locality and found the skeleton. There was a bullet hole in the head or skull, which had evidently been the wound from which the person died. The clothing still encased the bones of the body, except where torn off by coyotes in feeding upon the remains. A knife, sling shot, small key, a small comb and a few odds and ends, such as a boy usually carries, were found in the overalls pockets. The shoes, still containing the bones of the feet, were found within a few yards of the skeleton, evidently having been carried to that distance by coyotes, as the shoes had been gnawed down from the top an inch or two. The bullet that made the hole in skull was also found.

The dress and general appearance of the remains indicate that it was a young Indian by the name of Chatto Arambula, who it is presumed was killed by another young Indian, called Mose Hen. Young Arambula was last seen alive with Mose Hen about two years ago last November. The two young Indians had always been chums, and had at that time been on a spree together. The return shortly after of Mose Hen witnout his friend created suspicion and considerable inquiry among the Indians; but no trace of the missing boy has ever been found unless it is in this skeleton.

Mose Hen was arrested by Sheriff Given on suspicion of having committed murder, in January two years ago, but nothing could be gleaned from him during his detention to warrant holding him, and in fact, he was discharged without examination or an formal charge being entered against him.

The brother of young Arambula identified the shoes and necktie found on the skeleton, and several other Indians also pronounce the remains as that of Chatto Arambula.

Mose Hen, shortly after the disappearance of young Arambula, removed to Bishop and has married and now resides there.

The Coroner's Jury met yesterday morning and examined Mr. Wright, who found the remains, and Dr. Blair, who made the examination, also an Indian by the name of George was questioned. Jury adjourned until Saturday, April 20, in order to procure more evidence before signing a verdict.

Death of Captain E. A. Reddy.

Captain Edward A. Reddy died yesterday afternoon at the Almshouse in San Francisco, of which he had been been superintendent for six years past. He had been in feeble health since the middle of last July, when he suffered a stroke of paralysis, and for a week past he had been lying at the point of death.

Captain Reddy was one of the best known men in the State. As a mining man and as an office holder he came in contact with many people and all who knew him cherished his friendship. He was genial, kindly and generous even to a fault, always ready to assist a friend at whatever sacrifice of his own time or money.

His birthplace was Woonsocket, R. I. He came to California in 1861 when he was but 16 years of age. He went at once to Virginia City and worked in the mines there, afterward to Aurora, Nevada, and finally to Inyo county, this State. In the early seventies he became part owner and manager of the Cerro Gordo mine in that county. His interests there were finally sold to Senators Stewart and Jones of Nevada for a sum reaching into the hundred thousands.

As a miner Captain Reddy had his ups and downs. At times he was wealthy, but always free-handed and careless of his wealth and much given to mining speculation; there were other times when he was in straitened circumstances.

General McComb, Warden of the State Prison at San Quentin, made him captain of the guard in 1884, and it was that office, which he filled most admirably, that gave him the title of captain. He served in that capacity till 1891. For a year he was an assistant coiner at the United States Mint. He resigned that position to become superintendent of the Defiance mine at Darwin, Inyo county, which belonged to his brother, the late Colonel Patrick Reddy of the firm of Reddy, Campbell & Metson.

In 1895 Captain Reddy was appointed Superintendent of the Almshouse by the Board of Health selected by Governor Budd. So efficient was his administration that when the political complexion of the board changed he was left in charge of the institution.

During the six years of his superintendency there has not been a breath of scandal concerning the affairs of the Almshouse. Captain Reddy instituted many reforms and innovations which endeared him to the inmates of the Almshouse and made the institution a much efficient agent of charity.

As a mining superintendent Captain Reddy's courage was put to severe tests many times, and he became known all along the mother lode as a man who knew no fear. It was that reputation that led to his appointment as captain of the guard at San Quentin, and in that office he sustained his former reputation for fearlessness.

Mrs Carrie Reddy, the widow of the deceased, has been matron of the Almshouse during his term as superintendent. Captain Reddy leaves a married son, George M., who is in the employ of the Southern Pacific at Mojave, and a daughter, Katie, who is a school teacher in Los Angeles, the children of a former wife.—S. F. Call, April 11.

Toilers and Money.

Andrew Carnegie says that the man who works does not succeed. It is the man who gets others to do his work for him who builds up a fortune. This is true. It is always the schemer and not the toiler who comes out on top. But this confession from Carnegie is a body blow to those worshippers of success who point to him and declare that all any poor young man need do is to work hard and be economical and he will be another Carnegie. Mr. Carnegie himself punctures this nonsensical idea and gets right down to the meat of the whole thing when he concedes that it is the schemer and not the toiler who succeeds. And he is right. Look around any community and see if this is not so.—Alameda Encinal.

At this season the housekeeper must look specially after the baking powder.

As she cannot make good cake with bad eggs, no more can she make cake that is light, delicious and dainty with inferior baking powder.

Royal Baking Powder is indispensable for the preparation of the finest food. It imparts that peculiar lightness, sweetness and flavor noticed in the finest cake, biscuit, doughnuts, crusts, etc., which expert bakers say is unobtainable by the use of any other leavening agent.

The "Royal Baker and Pastry Cook"—containing over 800 most practical and valuable cooking receipts—free to every patron. Send postal card with your full address.

There are cheap baking powders, made from alum, but they are exceedingly harmful to health. Their astringent and cauterizing qualities add a dangerous element to food.

The Coughing Bean.

To the ordinary housemaid the falling of a house plant into a violent paroxysm of coughing is naturally disconcerting. Yet there are plants which will do this when the broom or the duster begins to make dust fly. This singular plant is the "coughing bean," known to the botanist as the Eutada tussiens. It is a native of warm and moist tropical countries and cannot and will not stand dust. When dust settles upon the breathing pores in the leaves of this plant and chokes them, a gas accumulates inside the leaves, and when it gains sufficient strength forcibly "blows off," clearing the pores of dust and making a sound exactly like coughing. At the same time the leaves tremble and the plant actually "gets red in the face," through the sinking of the green chlorophyll grains and the appearance of red particles on the leaves. This plant is sometimes used as a house plant, and sweeping the room sets it coughing, to the intense astonishment of persons not familiar with its peculiarities.

HE SLEPT IN SECURITY.

The Tonic a Small Boy Used For His Weak Feeling.

There is a 5-year-old boy in Massachusetts avenue who is of the blood of patriots. His grandfather was in both the Mexican and civil wars, and his father was also a soldier, consequently the little fellow has heard much "flag" talk in his short life and has exalted ideas of its protective qualities. He was the baby of the family till very recently and occupied a crib bed in his mother's room. When the new baby came, Harold was put to sleep in a room adjoining his mother's, and as he had never slept alone before his small soul was filled with nameless fears which he was too proud to tell in full.

"It's mighty lonesome in here, mamma," he called the first night after he had been tucked in his little white bed.

"Just remember the angels are near you and caring for you," replied mamma from the outer room.

"But, mamma," he objected, "I ain't acquainted with any angels, and I'd be scared of them if they came rustling round, same as I would of any other stranger."

"Now, Harold, you must go to sleep quietly. Nothing will hurt you."

"Can't I have the gas lighted in here?"

"No; mamma doesn't think it necessary, and it is not healthy."

There was silence for some time, and then the small voice piped up again. "Oh, mamma!"

"Yes, dear."

"May I have grandpa's flag?"

"Why, what for? I want you to go right to sleep."

"Please, mamma!" and a small nightgowned figure appeared at the door. "Just let me stick the flag up at the head of my bed, and then I'll go right to sleep, indeed I will! You know the other night grandpa said at the meeting that 'under the protecting folds of the flag the weakest would be safe,' and I feel mighty weak, mamma."

He got the flag, and when his mother looked in on him an hour later he was fast asleep, with a fat little fist under his red cheek, holding fast the end of the "protecting" flag.—Washington Star.

"JES' COMMON OLE MISERY."

Why Rufus Suddenly Decided That He Didn't Have Paralysis.

The boy's name is Rufus, and he was busily engaged in polishing the doctor's shoes while he was being shaved. As was his custom, the doctor said, "How are you feeling, Rufus?"

"I ain't much. Kindly poohly, thank you, doctah," answered the boy.

"What's the matter?"

"Paralysis."

"What?"

"Paralysis."

Had the doctor not been so well acquainted with the negro race, he might have allowed himself to show astonishment. As it was, he determined to see what would result from further inquiries.

"Where's your paralysis?" he asked kindly.

Rufus was drawing a rag swiftly across the left shoe.

"In the right hip, doctah," he answered.

"It's probably rheumatism," suggested the physician.

"No, indeed. It's paralysis. I reckon I knows rheumatism and I knows paralysis. This is suttenly paralysis."

The doctor drew a good sized pin from the lapel of his coat.

"Well, Rufus," he said seriously, "there is only one way to tell. Come here. I'm going to jab this pin in your hip. If it hurts, then you have rheumatism. If you don't feel it, then you are right, and you have paralysis."

The boy did not rise, but drew the rag thoughtfully across the shoe. Finally he said:

"Doctah, I reckon you mus' know more about them things than I do. I know it ain't nothin but jes' common ole misery."—Kansas City Star.

What Forty Poles Make.

A good story is told about a certain professor whose business it was to lecture to a number of students on surveying. During one of the lectures, the professor said that in his opinion the pole was of little or no value. To the astonishment of those present a Polish gentleman arose and, after accusing the professor of insulting his countrymen, demanded an apology.

The professor thereupon explained that the pole to which he referred was merely a term of measurement. The Polish gentleman, seeing his mistake, asked the professor to forgive his apparent rudeness. To this the professor smartly replied:

"You could not be rude, sir, even if you tried, for it takes 40 poles to make one rood!"

CONQUEST OF THE FINNS.

Russia Has Nearly Succeeded in Exterminating the Nation.

Finland is no longer a nation, nor are the people of the provinces recognized as a race distinct from Russians. According to the latest reports from Helsingfors, the Finlanders have small reason to look for any modification of the new Russian policy. A little while ago there was grave anxiety lest the Finnish Cadet School at Fredericksham, one of the most popular institutions in the country, should be suppressed, but this danger seems to have been averted for the present by a visit from the Grand Duke Constantine, who expressed great satisfaction with the condition of the schools and the scholars. Other events, however, point to the continuance of Gen. Bobrikoff's repressive and Russianizing policy. Two papers, one published in a provincial town, and a weekly journal in Helsingfors, have been suppressed forever, and the preventive censorship is applied everywhere with the utmost rigor.

The governor general is energetically enforcing the restrictions on the right to hold meetings, and he has in circulars to the provincial governors issued instructions for the introduction of Russian as the language of the provincial government offices, even earlier and more fully than is provided for in the language of the ordinance promulgated last autumn. Denunciations of private persons by secret agents, as well as public authorities, are events of well-nigh daily occurrences, and one consequence of these secret reports is that five university professors have been threatened with summary dismissal unless they "bind themselves to mix no more in political agitation." This was the message given to the vice chancellor of the University of Helsingfors on the latter's recent visit to St. Petersburg. Professors, however, cannot be dismissed except on a judgment passed by a court of justice. The indictment against one is that he delivered a series of university-extension lectures on the constitutional law of Finland. A final decision on the military question, which involves the very existence of the Finnish army as a national institution, is expected before long.

Two weeks after its publication, 40,000 copies of "Alice in Old Vincennes" were sold. It is a story of American life by Maurice Thompson.

Mme. Sarah Grand says that in her youth she wrote fiction, verse and essays. "The essays," she declares, "are very funny, chiefly marked by the commonplaces of the theory of life, which are now associated with the old woman. Then I began to think."

Here is a story told in Notes and Queries: A lady asked the novelist what her duty was in certain difficult circumstances, and received a clear reply. "But," she objected, "if I did that I should die." "Surely, that has nothing to do with you doing your duty," answered George Eliot.

Miss Harraden has found a feminine translator in Norway who is "more than usually calm" in impudence. This person entirely omitted the last chapter from her version of "Ships That Pass in the Night," and when remonstrated with coolly replied that in her judgment the story was greatly improved by the omission of the last chapter.

Miss Proctor's New Hampshire poems are attracting attention for their homely simplicity. This Old Home Week edition, as it is called, is issued by Little, Brown & Co., publishers, and offers such subjects as "Monadnock in October," "The Hills Are Home," "Kearsarge," "Keep the Forests," "Star Island Church," "The Bluebird," "Merrimac River" and "The Lost War Sloop."

The New York Times Saturday Review has a column filled with the expressed desires of people who want to sell or exchange books. The following appeared recently—name omitted: "C. R. K., 000 West 23d street, New York City: I want to sell or exchange a carefully selected library of thirty volumes, all in good condition, for a boy from 14 to 19 years of age." A good boy ought to be worth more.

The Boy with the Spade.

No weight of ages bows him down,
That barefoot boy with fingers brown.
There's nothing empty in his face,
No burdens of the human race
Are on his back, nor is he dead
To joy or sorrow, hope or dread.
For he can grieve, and he can hope,
Can shrink with all his soul from soap.
No brother to the ox is he,
He's second cousin to the bee;
He loosens and lets down his jaw—
And brings it up—his gum to "chaw."
There's naught but sweat upon his brow.
'Tis slanted somewhat forward now.
His eyes are bright with eager light,
He's working with an appetite.
Ah, no! That boy is not afraid
To wield with all his strength his spade!
Nor has he any spite at fate—
He's digging angleworms for bait.

Working Out Grass Problems.

Among the great nations of the world this has been the first to give official recognition to the importance of grass crops by establishing in the department of agriculture a division of agrostology, especially devoted to working out grass problems. During the last year 6,000 trial packages of seeds from collections made by the division have been distributed, more than 3,000 grasses have been identified for correspondents, and replies to more than 600 inquiries relative to the methods of cultivation, uses and feeding value of grasses have been prepared.

Origin of the Name Plantagenet.

York and Lancaster were titles and Plantagenet a family name. The origin of this historic cognomen affords a very fair illustration of how family names in general originated. One Mortimer, a knight, wore a sprig of broom plant, planta-genesta, in his helmet.

Life is but a temporary harbor on the shore of the boundless ocean of eternity.

A WHOLE VILLAGE

Attacked by Grip—One Family Escapes by Using Pe-ru-na.

WINONA, STARK CO., IND.

During the winter I and my family of six were taken with la grippe. The disease was very prevalent at that time in the village where I resided, nearly everyone being sick with it. Our doctors treated it as best they could, but were very unsuccessful in the treatment of it. As soon as my family were taken sick I went to the drugstore and bought six bottles of Pe-ru-na, and we all took it according to the directions given on the bottle: and although our cases seemed to be more than usually violent in the outset, yet our recovery was prompt, and we were all well much sooner than those who were treated by the regular phyiscians.

Many people died of this la grippe during this epidemic, and few, if any, were sick so short a time as myself and family. After we were all well we had one bottle of Pe-ru-na left.

Charley's Aunt.

Mr. Penley, otherwise Charley's Aunt, told the following: "A military man, a friend of Mr. Penley, took his daughter to the stalls and, having a busy and tiring day, went calmly to sleep in his easy seat during the interval between the curtain raiser and 'Charley's Aunt.' The daughter sympathetically allowed him to remain in peace until the curtain went up for the commencement of the play of the evening; then she gently nudged him in the ribs and whispered 'Charley's Aunt!' to remind him of his whereabouts.

"The gentleman still slept on, and his daughter tried again. She gave her father an extra push and murmured, with emphasis: 'Papa, do wake up! "Charley's Aunt!"'

"This time it was effectual, for the colonel leaped to his feet and cried, 'Bless me, so it is!' and began to shake hands furiously with a demure old lady who happened to be passing along the stalls in front of him on the way to her allotted seat. 'Bless me, so it is! How do you do, madam? And how is Charley?'"—London Answers.

Russell and the Solicitor.

It is said that once when the late Lord Russell, then Sir Charles, was on circuit, he became so indignant with every one in general and his solicitor client in particular that he seized his large and heavy brief and smote the solicitor on the head with it. The solicitor indignantly collected his papers and hurried out of court, murmuring that he would never brief Sir Charles again.

Some time afterward a shipping magnate came to the same solicitor with a big case. "Brief Russell," he said. The solicitor said he was sorry, but it was impossible, as Russell had never apologized. "Then give me my papers," said the shipowner, "and I'll go to some one who will."

Eventually the unhappy man of law, not wishing to lose his best client, had to apologize to Sir Charles Russell for leaving the court when assaulted.—Pearson's Weekly.

"So Go."

Lady Dorothy Nevill is one of the wittiest women in London society. Some time ago there was a rich and ambitious man in society who went in for entertaining largely and especially for making his parties interesting and representative. A marked falling off began to take place after awhile in the quality of his guests. Lady Dorothy, commenting on this deterioration, said, "Once we used to meet Browning and Whistler and Henry James and so on there; but now we only meet—so on."—Chambers' Journal.

The Athenian of Today.

The Athenians dine late the year round and, whenever the weather will permit, in the open air. As the heated season advances the dinner hour is set later and later until in August 9:30 or 10 becomes the common thing. Fancy going to the theater after that! Yet the open air performances are liberally patronized, and they do not begin, of course, until after dinner. The legend "Curtain rises promptly at 9" is a snare and a delusion, as many a foreigner has found, to his extreme annoyance.

The out of door dining and the sky roofed theaters are so typically Greek that they serve as a link between modern and classical times. The old Greek, as everybody knows, was an outdoor man, his house serving as little more than a sleeping place and storeroom. The Athenian of today dines in a garden, on his terrace or in a park. If he is too poor to possess any of these accessories, he sets his table upon the sidewalk. Many of the cheap restaurants appropriate the walks for dining rooms. One is often compelled when taking an evening stroll to dodge in and out among dozens of tables covered with reasonably clean linen and lighted by means of candles, whose flames are protected from the wind by means of glass globes.—Scribner's.

Doctors' "Cat Naps."

The "cat naps" indulged in by the late Dr. William Pepper constituted a standing joke among his intimate friends. He had the faculty of going to sleep at will and waking up when he willed. He would sometimes when under a mental strain keep a roomful of patients waiting while he slept soundly in his private office for three minutes or five minutes, or as long as he wished. Then he would resume his duties, greatly refreshed.

Another prominent physician has a queer habit of napping, although he only takes one a day and that directly after luncheon, which with him is a hearty meal. He repairs to his office and throws himself in a chair at a point where the polished wood floor is not covered by the rug. He holds a bunch of keys between the forefinger and thumb of his right hand, which is allowed to hang loosely over the arm of the chair. Then he dozes off, but it is never more than a doze, for the moment his fingers relax the keys drop to the bare floor, acting as an alarm clock. It is scarcely a nap—just a brief relaxation of the mental and bodily faculties. The doctor calls it his siesta, and if he misses it he says he doesn't feel quite himself for the rest of the day.—Philadelphia Record.

Quite Fit.

"Mr. Upner," said the prosecuting attorney, "this is an action in which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for alleged injuries received at the hands of White Caps. Have you heard anything about the case?"

"No, sir," replied the talesman.

"We'll take him, your honor."

"Mr. Upner," asked the attorney for the defense, "do you know what a 'whitecap' is?"

"Yes, sir. It's a wave that's got foam on top of it."

"We'll take him, your honor."—Chicago Tribune.

Loyalty to His Employer.

That young man who consented to have a portion of his blood let out to save his employer, set a remarkable example of heroism. The incident shows what power there is in good blood. There is only one natural way to get good blood, and that is from the stomach. If the stomach needs assistance, try Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. This wonderful medicine cures dyspepsia, indigestion, constipation, and makes rich red blood.

Of Philipsburg, Montana, Tells How She Was Cured of Dandruff.

Mrs. Mary Gregovich, of Philipsburg, Montana, under date of Nov. 26, 1899, writes: "I had typhoid fever this summer, consequently was losing my hair terrible, and my head in places was perfectly bald. Newbro's Herpicide had just come into use in Philipsburg, and the doctor strongly recommended it to me. After 3 or 4 applications my hair stopped falling out, and is coming in again quite thick. I used to be troubled greatly with dandruff, of which I am now quite cured." Kill the dandruff germ with Herpicide.

A MODERN MIRACLE.

CASE OF LOCOMOTOR ATAXIA CURED NEAR CHICAGO.

Victim Lost the Sight of One Eye and Was Unable to Walk—Vision Restored and the Use of Limbs Regained. A Sworn Statement.

A recent cure that seems almost a miracle was that of Samuel Curnock of 62 Twenty-second avenue, Melrose Park, Ill. The story is best told in his own words. He says:

"Early in 1898 I began to experience a worn-out feeling and noticed that I became tired after very slight exertion. I continued at my work in the machine shop until July 2, 1898, when I suffered from a fall and after that time grew rapidly worse. A physician was called and pronounced my trouble locomotor ataxia. He treated me for four months and there was no improvement in my condition. I was told that my case was incurable and that I would continue to grow worse until death relieved me. I was not confined to my bed, although I spent much of my time lying down and was entirely unable to work. I could hardly stand; it seemed as if my legs would give out from under me, and my movements were like those of a drunken man. A cold numbness came in my right side and I lost the strength of my right arm. Then my eyes began to blur so that I could see nothing distinctly, and in a short time I became totally blind in my right eye.

"Last December I began taking Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and within a month I was so much improved that I determined to persist in the treatment. At the end of the second month I was able to return to my work and have not lost a day on account of illness since that time. Since I began taking the pills I have gained 30 pounds in weight, can walk almost as well as ever and my sight is fully restored. I firmly believe that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People saved my life, and enabled me to again earn my livelihood.

OLD ROYAL STATE COACH USED BY EDWARD VII.

OLD ROYAL STATE COACH USED BY EDWARD.

The gorgeous state coach of the royal family of England, used in the recent procession to Parliament, is now aged and time-worn. This illustration is reproduced from an old German print of 1830. The coach was the royal property of George III. and George IV. From the latter monarch it passed to Victoria and was used at the time of her coronation, and then, as history goes, did not make its appearance again until the marriage of the present King and Princess Alexandra. The coach is of a German design, quite popular at the close of the eighteenth century and the opening of the nineteenth. It is constructed of the finest woods and overlaid in gold. Symbolical figures adorn its exposed parts. There is Neptune, War, Peace, Music, Poetry, all portrayed and serving to indicate the delights and attributes of the empire and ruling monarch. It might be thought that it was comfortable to ride in, but report has it that no royal personage ever cared to sit in it except as custom required. Horses of the noblest breed are always used in hauling it about at functions, and they are covered with trappings of costly make. Footmen guide the horses, and once there were outriders. Footmen also preceded it with horses, and the entire show was put up a century and more ago to impress strangers with the power and magnificence of monarchs. The coach is exceedingly heavy, but, owing to the style of manufacture in the olden days, is inclined to roll and present a rather undignified appearance if not carefully handled. In the days when monarchs could only travel by horse the state coach was a great and important affair, but now it has become only a curiosity of times gone by, taken out as a memory and nothing more.

MISS MANDY'S NEW YORK TRIP.

Miss Mandy wuz the keerfullest housekeeper, high or low!
Warn't no one in the country could make a dollar go
As fur as she could make it, in purchasin' o' things—
She pulled the eagle's feathers, an' spread the eagle's wings!

The keerfullest housekeeper!—the grocerymen all roun',
They shook to see her comin' like a earthquake shook the groun'!
They couldn't git ahead o' her—her motto wuz, all times:
"The dimes—they make the dollars, an' the dollars make the dimes!"

Well, she'd never been out Billville sence the town wuz corporate,
Till some o' them swell friends o' hers took her to New York State—
To the very city of it—the biggest, best hotel,
Whar each minute meant more money than arithmetics could tell!

The waiters thronged aroun' her, all dressed up fit to kill;
An' ever' time she went to eat, she asked 'em: "What's the bill?"
An', lookin' at the bill o' fare, she only shook her head,
An' to the great surprise o' all, she hollered out, "Corn-bread!"

It all wuz jest too much fer her—to see a waiter smile,
Up thar meant just two dollars, which at home would go a mile!
An' so she couldn't stand it; she left that New York shore;
An' she's now at home in Billville, to economize some more!

BRIARDALE MANOR.

IT was the only pear on the tree, and it dangled so perilously over the roadway that Cissie Melville had to exercise the greatest care in cutting it off. Reaching forward, until her dainty shot feet seemed scarcely to touch the ladder, she sandwiched the stalk between two little fingers, drew a long breath and brought the scissors together smartly.

Setting her red lips, she climbed to the topmost rung of the frail ladder, clutched the wall and looked over. Then she pulled back her head with a startled jerk, for the perverse pear was reclining serenely on the wooden bench below, within easy reach of a dark-haired, well-proportioned young man.

"He was sitting there when it dropped," she thought, "and means to eat it when the coast is clear. The wretch! How dare he?"

Summoning all her courage to her aid, she coughed twice in a semi-apologetic way, leaned over the wall once more and timidly addressed herself to the occupant of the bench.

"Do you mind handing me that pear?" she asked. "It fell over as I was cutting it, and I really can't spare it. There isn't another on the tree."

The young man made on answer.

"Asleep," said Cissie, "or shamming. Must I drop stones on his hat, or go round to him? Perhaps the latter course would be the wiser."

The orchard was a long way from the gate, but she ran her hardest and reached the bench. Quick though she had been, however, the young man had taken advantage of the interval to rouse himself, and was gazing at the mellow pear with sleepy wonder in his big brown eyes.

"Your pardon," said Cissie, approaching him with sudden shyness, "but that pear belongs to me. I am clumsy and allowed it to slip through my fingers."

"Another disappointment," he said, restoring the fruit gallantly. "I was half under the impression that some good fairy had developed a penchant for me and sent me this as a special mark of favor, but it seems I was a little premature. How much farther is it to Briardale Hall, please? That stone over there says three miles, but I sincerely hope it's laboring under a delusion."

Cissie reluctantly confirmed the milestone's declaration, and the stranger rose with a stifled sigh. She thought him lazy at first, but when he commenced to walk and she saw how badly he limped, her heart was moved to pity, and she impulsively called on him to stay.

"Do sit down again!" she cried. "You look tired, and they ought to have told you at the station how far it was. They never will, though, for they don't like the trouble of hunting up a fly. See, uncle is coming up the road, and I'm sure he will gladly give you some lunch."

Longing with all his heart to accept this generous invitation, and yet doubtful of the propriety of it, the young man hesitated, and while he did so the rector came within sight of him and gave a joyful cry of recognition.

These two, it seemed, had known each other years before—indeed, the versatile rector had himself coached the young man for the army and had danced for joy when his pupil came off well—and the unexpected meeting so delighted them both that they talked and laughed like schoolboys at a picnic.

"Run in, Cissie, and get Capt. Clinton some lunch," said the rector fondly. "Don't wait for an introduction. You'll be like old friends when you've known each other five minutes, take my word for it."

The pleasant little lunch was almost over before Percy spoke of the errand which had brought him to Briardale. Then he told the rector that he had come to see the owner of Briardale Hall, with a view to purchase the manor house, a pretty building which, for want of a better tenant, had long since been turned over to the rats and spiders.

Percy Clinton paid a remarkable number of visits to the Melvilles after that, and nowhere could he have found a more cordial welcome.

One beautiful morning in August, the captain came into the garden and sat down beside Cissie. He seemed to be strangely excited, and the girl's heart gave a throb of apprehension as she looked at him.

"You have seen old Williams, of Briardale?" she said, as carelessly as she could, though she fervently hoped his answer would be "No."

"I have," he replied, with a nervous little laugh. "By climbing the wall and dropping into the garden I managed to catch him unawares and when he saw there was no possible escape for him he held out his hand and said he was delighted to see me. Did you ever know such bare-faced hypocrisy? After I'd spent the best part of the summer in hunting him too."

"I think it was nice of the old man," said Cissie, wishing he would tell his news without beating about the bush. "Was he so scrupulously polite all the time?"

"Almost too much so," responded Percy gloomily. "If he had stormed about the place and torn his hair, I think I could have bargained with him better, but he was so suave that my own courtesies sounded blunt and stiff. In short, he refused to let me have the manor."

"What a shame!" cried Cissie, with a flash of girlish petulance, which gave an added loveliness to her face.

"There is just one hope for me, Miss Melville," said he, leaning forward in his chair and lowering his voice a little, "but I fear it is rather a forlorn one. Old Williams objects to me because I am a bachelor. If I will agree to marry and promise to give no noisy parties, he will sell me the house."

Some of the color left Cissie's cheeks and all unconsciously she gripped the lace that fluttered above her palpitating bosom.

"It should not be hard to fulfill a condition like that," she said, trying to smooth a telltale catch out of her voice. "Noisy parties are not fashionable in Briardale, and men can always get married."

"So they can," he responded earnestly, "but not always to women they most desire. I am ambitious, Miss Melville, and I want to marry the sweetest, loveliest and kindest girl in all the world. If she will not have me, I shall remain a bachelor for the rest of my life."

"And the manor will be doomed," said Cissie in a hurried undertone.

"Exactly," he replied, letting his hand fall pleadingly on hers, "unless you will it otherwise, Miss Melville."

"It is a beautiful house, Cissie," he went on, ready at the lightest sign to clasp her in his arms. "Don't let it go to rack and ruin when one little word will save it. Speak, darling."

She looked at him with a happy dimpling smile.

"If the manor depends on me, Percy, it will not be desolate long," she murmured. "I love the dear old place, and I love its future owner, too!"—Chicago Times-Herald.

HUMOR IN THE COURTROOM.

Specimens of Irish Wit that Have Convulsed Grave Judges.

The quaint repartee and whimsical humor of an Irish witness give a fillip of excitement to the dullest courtroom. Quite recently a woman asked for a warrant against a man for using abusive language in the street. "What did he say?" asked the magistrate. "He went foreninst the whole world at the corner of Capel street and called me—yes, he did, yer wuship—an ould ex-communicated gasometer." "He called me out of me name," said a witness in a case of assault. The judge, trying to preserve the relevancy of the witness' testimony, said: "That's a civil action, my good woman." The witness' eye flashed fire as she looked up at the judge and retorted: "Musha, then, if you call that a 'civil action' 'tis a bad bla'gard ye must be yerself!" A witness was once asked the amount of his gross income. "Me gross income, is it?" he answered. "Sure, an' ye know I've no gross income. I'm a fisherman and me income is all net."

"No man," said a wealthy but rather weak-headed barrister, "should be admitted to the bar who has not an independent landed property." "May I ask, sir," said a witty and eminent Irish lawyer, "how many acres make a wiseacre?" The element of the unexpected, which characterizes Irish fun, crops out in other places besides the courtroom. It may be an old story, but is as perennial as its subject, of the priest who preached a sermon on "Grace." "An' me brethren," he said in conclusion, "if ye have wan spark av heavenly grace, wather it, wather it continually."

Another priest who had delivered what seemed to him an excellent and striking sermon was anxious to ascertain its effect on his flock. "Was the sermon to-day to y'r liking, Pat?" he inquired of one of them. "Troth, y'r riverence, it was a grand sermon entirely," said Pat, with such genuine admiration that his reverence felt moved to investigate further. "Was there any one part of it more than another that seemed to take hold of ye" he inquired. "Well, now, as ye are for axin' me most was y'r riverence's parseverance—the way ye wint over same thing agin and agin and agin."—Green Bag.

THE HERO OF SHILOH.

Gen. Benjamin M. Prentiss, Who Died Recently in Missouri.

Gen. Benjamin M. Prentiss, who was called the "hero of Shiloh," died at Bethany, Mo. He was 81 years old.

GEN. PRENTISS.

As a young man, in Illinois, he organized a company of volunteers who did service when Smith and the other Mormons were driven out of Nauvoo and who also fought in the Mexican war. When Lincoln called for volunteers in 1861, this company enlisted almost to a man. Its captain, Prentiss, was made a colonel of the Seventh Illinois infantry and soon thereafter a brigadier general. He marched to join Grant at Pittsburg Landing, arriving there three days before the battle of Shiloh. Prentiss was given command of a new division, which entered the battle with only two brigades. He maintained his ground for several hours, steadily fighting. One of the brigades was beaten back, and the other, after a heroic resistance, was compelled to surrender. The general, after six months' captivity, was released in October, 1862, and appointed a major general the following month. He was a member of the court martial convened to try Fitz John Porter. In 1863 Gen. Prentiss resigned his commission and devoted himself to civil pursuits.

A MYSTERY IN IOWA.

GREW OUT OF AN UNNATURAL MARRIAGE.

A Pretty Girl's Union to a Crippled Miser—His Changed Nature—A Mysterious Death – Life Imprisonment for the Young Wife.

From Sigourney, Iowa, come the details of a tragedy growing out of a union of lives in which there was not a union of hearts. A young woman not yet 20 years of age has been found guilty of poisoning her crippled husband and sentenced to spend the rest of her life at hard labor in the State penitentiary.

The young woman's name is Sarah Kuhn. She is of English parentage and her maiden name was Crane. She was born and brought up on an Iowa farm. At 16 she was sent out to earn her own living, and then began the sordid romance which has left her behind prison bars. It began when Sarah fell in love with Andrew Smith, a broad-shouldered young farmer of little more than her own age, who was by no means so much in love with her. For a year or so they went about together and the farmers' wives said no good of the girl. Then the young farmer's attachment cooled; and here the cripple whom Sarah is accused of murdering came into the story.

Charles Kuhn was wofully deformed. Inflammatory rheumatism had twisted his legs so as to bring the knees together no matter how he stood, and he walked with a corkscrew gait. Besides this disease had left one of his long arms entirely useless. He was known as a miserly, hard-working German, who toiled early and late in his shoemaker's shop for sheer love of the money his labor brought him and once he was past middle age the wags of the district often amused themselves by suggesting that he take to himself a wife. The old man did begin to think of marrying. Two years ago he asked his nearest friend to find him a wife, and the friend he asked was the broad-shouldered young farmer, Andrew Smith.

KUHN AND HIS WIFE AND THE FATED RIG.

The request came at a time when Smith was growing tired of Sarah Crane. He thought over it and finally promised to help the old man to a wife. A month later he told him that he had found him a girl and at a Fourth of July celebration at Delta, near where the cobbler lived, he introduced him to Sarah Crane. Six months later Kuhn asked the girl to marry him. She told him he was crazy and ordered him away. The cobbler appealed to his friend Smith again. What persuasions Smith used to his sweetheart nobody knows, but three months later Kuhn and the girl were married. Smith's father, who is a justice of the peace, married them, and the only witness was Smith. Sarah's parents, when they heard of the match, declared that they would never see their daughter again. They kept their word till she was in jail.

MRS. SARAH KUHN

With the marriage the cobbler's habits changed. He bought his wife everything she asked for and her neighbors began to say that she had not done so badly after all. The only thing that troubled her crippled husband seemed to be the fear that she might leave him. One day she lightly threatened to do so. He sought his friends and asked them what more they thought he could do for Sarah. The next day a villager met him coming out of a lawyer's office in Sigourney.

"I've just finished the best job I ever did in my life," said the cobbler.

"What was that?" asked the villager.

"I've just willed all I own to my wife," was the reply.

A month later the old man was dead. At her trial the will was made to tell strongly against his widow, though it was not shown that she inspired, urged or sanctioned the action by a single word and it was pointed out by her lawyers that under the laws of the State of Iowa, where a will is made and the wife is the beneficiary in whole or in part, and it is proved that she took the life of the testator, the will becomes inoperative so far as she is concerned.

A Fatal Trip.

Labor day, about a month after the will was made, was the cobbler's last. On that day he and his wife drove to an entertainment at What Cheer. Nothing was developed at the trial to show that the wife planned or suggested the trip. While the couple were in the village the husband purchased a dozen bottles of beer, which he placed in his buggy. He left his wife alone in it later, while he wandered about the streets. Then they started home. What occurred on the drive only the wife has told.

"When we were a short way out of town," she told the sheriff afterward, "Charley opened a bottle of beer and we both drank some. He was in a good humor and after finishing that bottle he asked me to sing him a German song I knew. I held the reins and sang while he opened the second bottle. He joined in the chorus. He drank from the second bottle and then he passed it to me, saying that it tasted bitter. I drank a little, but not much, and he drank more. Then he set the bottle down, and I saw that something was wrong. He lay on his side mumbling. I thought the beer had gone to his head. When we got near old man Snyder's house he began to cry that I had poisoned him. Theen I shouted, too, and Snyder came out into the road."

Snyder was the principal witness agaainst the woman at her trial. He testified that when the buggy reached his house Mrs. Kuhn was crying "Come quick, my husband is dying." He came to the buggy and Kuhn told him to take the reins and drive as fast as he could to the doctor's, because he'd been poisoned.

"What else did he say?" said the county prosecutor.

"Well," said the witness, "I hesitated about taking the reins. His wife said she didn't know what was the matter with him, but he'd been drinking beer and eating bologna, so I climbed into the buggy and drove toward the doctor's. When we got pretty well down to the place where you turn I asked whether we should go to the doctor's or home, and his wife said it would be better to take him home. Then he cried, 'No, take me to Dr. Busby's; she's poisoned me!' I thought not, and told him so, and she said: 'What makes you talk so, Charley? What will people think of you talking that way?' He kept saying: 'She poisoned me, Snyder, she did.' Then she would say again that she had not, and for a while he wouldn't say anything. One time during the drive he turned to her and asked: 'Why did you do it?'"

The doctor was not at home and the cripple, still crying that he had been poisoned, died in the buggy on the way to his cottage. An autopsy revealed traces of strychnine in his stomach and in the beer left in the bottle in the roadway was found enough strychnine to kill a dozen men. On the roadway over which the couple was driven there was discovered a small glass phial half filled with strychnine. It bore the name of a New York firm. On the trial it was brought out that this was found on the side of the roadway on which the wife had driven. No evidence of a purchase of poison by either husband or wife was discovered.

The prosecution argued that the woman, tired of her crippled husband, poisoned the beer in the wagon in the few moments when she was left alone by him in the village. The defense showed that she had no means of uncorking the bottle and argued that Kuhn himself, fearing that his wife would carry out her threat to leave him, had bought the strychnine contemplating murder and suicide on his way home. It was urged that Kuhn's dying declaration was an opinion rather than a statement of fact, and therefore inadmissible. The jury, composed of solid farmers, however, regarded it as the essential feature of the testimony. To the last the wife protested her innocence.

Costly Hailstorms in France.

The annual loss to France caused by the ravages of hailstorms is said to amount to about 83,000,000 francs. From 1873 to 1895 the figures varied from 40,000,000 to 134,000,000 francs.

One trouble with the world is that the fool-killer is gallant, and when he meets some women he raises his hat instead of his club.

"Not guilty" isn't necessarily an innocent remark.

How to Make and Spin Tops.

Any one can buy a top if he can get a few pennies from his father or mother, and any one can make far better and finer tops with a little trouble and industry. Here are some interesting tops that you can buy anywhere, but which you can make with very simple tools and cheap material. The simplest of house tops, to be spun on top of a table, or some other smooth surface, is made simply by putting a sharpened stick through the center of a piece of pasteboard cut into a perfect circle. Care must be taken that the wood is longer above the disk than below, so it will keep its balance. If the disk is decorated in water colors it will be prettier as it spins. Quite a game of tops may be played by making these tops for a number of children and letting them try who can make his spin longest.

SOME HOME-MADE TOPS.

A fine out-door top is the Russian double-header. It can be whittled out of hard wood by any boy with a sharp jackknife, who will take care to get it just like Fig. 2. It is spun with a string around the middle, and if properly made will beat any of the single tops you can buy. And then if you would like to make a top which will spin in air, take a bit of thin pasteboard, cut five equi-distant oval holes in it, one in the center and four around it, as seen in Fig. 4. Paste a small paper cone over the central oval (Fig. 3) and let it dry, when you have a top which can spin in various ways. You can put a stick with rounded end in the cone (Fig. 3) and twirling the stick rapidly between the palms of your hands, the top will fly up in the air and perform there. Or you may insert a stick into one of the other ovals (Fig. 4) and swinging the top around until it is going rapidly, withdraw the stick and the top will spin in eccentric curves curves. If this top is colored in various stripes it will be even more interesting in its turnings and twistings.

Ways to Earn Money.

It may be a help to those who are teaching little people to earn and save—an important lesson—to read the following list of ways in which children have earned money, as compiled by the Congregationalist:

Washing windows.
Picking apples and other fruit.
Raking up leaves.
Doing errands.
Picking over raisins.
Weeding in the garden and the paths.
Picking up pins at a cent a dozen.
Raising vegetables.
Caring for animals.
Washing and wiping dishes.
Ironing.
Singing for the old folks.
Hemming papa's handkerchiefs.
Dusting.
Beating rugs and mats.
Stoning cherries.
Making and selling paper flowers.
Gathering and selling wild flowers, autumn leaves, etc.
Mending.
Caring for the baby.
Hemming towels, etc.
Waiting on grandpa and grandma.
Reading aloud.
Caring for the table silver.
Making and selling lamp lighters and iron holders.
Self-denial of candy, etc.

"I Didn't Think."

If all the troubles in the world
Were traced back to the start,
We'd find not one in ten began
From want of willing heart.
But there's a sly, woe-working elf
Who lurks about youth's brink,
And sure dismay he brings away—
The elf "I didn't think."

He seems so sorry when he's caught,
His mien is all contrite,
He so regrets the woe he wrought,
And wants to make things right.
But wishes do not heal a wound,
Nor weld a broken link;
The heart aches on, the link is gone—
All through "I didn't think."

When brain is comrade to the heart,
And heart from soul draws grace,
"I didn't think" will quick depart
For lack of resting place.
If from that great unselfish stream,
The golden rule we drink,
We'll keep God's laws and have no cause
To say, "I didn't think."

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

She Has a Precious Doll.

Naomi Oles, the little 6-year-old daughter of Frederick Oles, of Lansdale, Pa., has in her possession a doll which is considered the most valuable possession in the county and which has created considerable comment because of its headgear, to which there is an interesting story attached.

Twenty-one years ago Mr. Oles, father of Naomi, was the proud possessor of a head of silken locks with a natural tendency to curl. As he grew older his mother thought it was not becoming that a boy of his age should wear such pendants and it was with much persuasion that she finally induced him to have his hair cut. When the barber had shorn him of his locks the mother secured them and placed them away for safe keeping.

Recently she had a doll's wig made of the hair and, having had it placed upon a pretty doll, the grandmother presented it to Naomi. The little girl is extremely proud of her gift and seems to thoroughly realize the value of this doll with natural hair so peculiarly secured. Little Naomi's present is the envy of all the little girls in the vicinity.

Tommy Wanted a Reason.

"Mamma," queried little Tommy, "can a door talk?"

"No, dear, of course not," was the reply.

"Then," continued the youthful information seeker, "why did you tell Jane to answer the door this morning?"

Not Always Polite Things.

Teacher—What does h-u-n-t spell, Johnny?

Johnny—Dunno.

Teacher—Don't you know what your father does when he loses his collar button?

Johnny—Yes'm. He says things.

Would Still Be a Puller.

"Charlie," said a visitor to a bright little 5-year-old, 'are you going to be a dentist like your father and pull people's teeth when you grow up?"

"No, sir," replied Charlie. "I'm going to be a lawyer like Uncle George and pull people's legs."

Elbows on the Fingers.

Small Willie was talking about his knuckles, and his little 4-year-old sister asked him what he meant. "Why," replied little Willie, "I mean the little elbows on my fingers."

Little Alice's Description.

Little 3-year-old Alice stood watching her mother baking pancakes. After a few moments' silent observation she said: "Put on back, turn over on stomach, then eat."

Composition of Sweetbreads.

Elsie (aged 3)—Mamma, I want to ask you a serious question.

Mamma—Well, what is it, dear?

Elsie—Are the sweetbreads made of loaf sugar?

DO THEIR WORK IN SECRET.

Uncle Sam's Detectives Have Important Duties to Perform.

Uncle Sam's large and well-organized secret service is made up mostly of men who come properly under the head of detectives with police powers, but it has its class of bona fide spotters, whose entire duty it is to ingratiate themselves with persons suspected of having designs to evade the custom-house duties and to warn the baggage inspectors at this end of the impending swindle. In cleverness, address and adaptability the secret service spotter is easily at the head of his profession, and even ranks with the trained experts of the European diplomatic corps. It is essential that he should be a man of the world, for he must associate with all kinds of people on equal terms. He has no fixed abode, but lives in various European capitals when he is not on shipboard, where he is much of the time. He must never let himself be in the slightest degree suspected.

There is always a number of these agents in Paris because of the great American trade there. They live the life apparently of flaneurs and boulevardiers. In all lines of trade that concern dutiable goods they are experts, and no large purchase by an American in Paris is unknown to them. Their circle of acquaintance is enormous, but nobody knows them for what they are. In one way or another they contrive to make the acquaintance of any persons whom they suspect, and unostentatiously and unremittingly trail him. Many a time some man who has made a heavy purchase of diamonds or laces and so disposed them that he felt sure of being able to get them through the port undiscovered has been passed on the dock by a chance acquaintance of the voyage over, who, unseen, presses a little note into the hand of the customs inspector. That note tells all that the wily smuggler would wish to keep secret, and his baggage is mercilessly ransacked until the hidden articles are brought to light. He has been followed by the spotter. Men employed in this line get good pay—as high as $10 a day—but it costs them much to live in the manner in which they must maintain themselves.—Ainslee's Magazine.

Comparison and Contradiction.

Rustic New England humor, though it is not always delicate, dearly loves the paradox in comparison and the contradiction. Of a crooked man, the people say, "He stands as straight as a sheep's hind leg," and "that 'ere road goes to Milford as straight as a snake can run." The bicycler is ploughing along laboriously through a sandy road, and the rustic who meets him exclaims, with compassion in his eyes, "Ain't it durned mean they won't let ye ride on the sidewalk." Nothing like a sidewalk within twenty miles.

Offered a Small Figure.

A few days since a popular attorney called upon another member of the profession and asked his opinion upon a certain point of law. The lawyer to whom the question was addressed drew himself up and said. "I generally get paid for what I know." The questioner drew a half dollar from his pocket, handed it to the other and coolly remarked: "Tell me all you know and give me the change."

A sweetheart is a charming fancy, but a wife is very apt to be a solemn fact.

BALLARAT MINES.

Work Being Done in Tuba and Pleasant Canyons.

Among the younger gold-producing camps of the Desert is Ballarat, Inyo county, in this State, in the Panamint range of mountains, about sixty-five miles northeast of Raudsburg.

To the west, stretching out in a sandy waste, is Panamint Valley, a dangerous piece of desert. On the opposite side of the range is Death Valley, always ready to extend its hospitality to the stranger. Between these two historic valleys is the great Panamint range, as majestic, picturesque, varied and well mineralized a pile as can be found in this great southwest. Wood in abundance covers its summits, and water in streams abounds in the canyons, affording, in some instances, water power for milling purposes.

In early days Senator John P. Jones opened and operated a great silver mine not many miles from the present camp of Ballarat. In those days all were looking for the white metal, and if there was gold known of in paying quantities little was said about it, so that, with the decline of silver, interest in this part of the country subsided. A few years ago a new era set in, and what was formerly known as a silver district has been changed to a gold one of large dimensions.

The producing properties of today, while not great in number, show the possibilities that await well directed labor and capital judiciously invested. Like all other camps, incompetence, bad management, and lack of capital have left their mark, and put some of the best prospects in the class of non-producers.

One of the best producers in the district at the present is the O. B. Joyful mine, situated in Tuba Canyon. It is owned principally by Los Angeles men and managed by T. N. Stebbins. Considerable development work has been done and a large tonnage of high-grade ore is blocked out. A stamp mill of twenty-five tons' capacity is kept constantly running, giving good returns. The company will probably double its crushing capacity within the next few weeks. Three miles distant from this property is the Gem group, owned by Mr. C. A. Weaver and others, and managed by Mr. Ed. Shuey. This company has been operating for about two years and results have been very encouraging to the owners. A stamp mill, operated by water power, treats the ore on the ground, extracting all free values, and by the cyanide process the tailings are worked with a profit. The mine is being developed in a conservative manner and new ore bodies of a good grade are being opened up to an extent that the milling capacity will soon have to be increased.

In what is called Pleasant Canyon are located several groups of claims, some of them away past the prospect stage, others still to be developed.

The famous Ratcliff property has been so much talked of and written about in the past that it would be presumptive to more than allude to it. At present it is in the hands of a receiver and closed down until satisfactory arrangements can be made with creditors. It is a magnificent property, well equipped, and thought by many to be the best one in this section.

The World Beater group, comprising thirteen claims, shows several thousand feet of development work and a large tonnage of low-grade ore. With proper equipment this property might be made to justify its name.

The Cooper mine has lately been sold to Mr. Lewis, of Los Angeles. A force of men is working on development and it is safe to say that good results will follow.

Mr. Ed Cross has recently sold a property to a Los Angeles company. A mill is to be put up soon and work will be carried on under the management of Mr. J. Howard. Other properties are being put in shape, and all indications point to renewed activity throughout this district.—A. B. Hall in Los Angeles Mining Review.

Messrs. F. A. Hines, F. Johnson and J. C. Talmage, of Los Angeles, visited the property of the Mazourka Mining & Water Co., this week and left for home Thursday morning via San Francisco.

E. Rittler, Geo. Worthington, Hypolite Galeron and Frank Gales, all of San Bernardino, who have been in Inyo county for the past two weeks buying horses passed through here Wednesday on their way home.

Miss Mary Mulholland and her friend, Miss Lou Landrum, arrived from Los Angeles yesterday morning. The young ladies will remain here for some time on a visit to Mrs. Chas. Mulholland, Miss Mulholland's mother.

GOOD

If the Merchants Agree.

The trouble with northern Inyo county is prohibitive or at least almost prohibitive freights and fares. The Southern Pacific will at some future date fill up the gap between Mojave and Keeler, but the S. P. has never been known to "fill a gap" unless compelled to do so by competition. Mr. C. P. Huntington was a star passenger on the Carson & Colorado Railroad shortly before his death, and there is no doubt that the necessary work to make a connection with Mojave would have been commenced ere this had Mr. Huntington lived as President of the S. P. to date. Los Angeles is the natural trading point for the merchants of the valley, and the Merchants & Manufacturers Association, of Los Angeles, have (by request) made a proposition to the merchants of Northern Inyo county, to put on a traction line from Mojave to all points in Northern Inyo county if a reasonable amount of compensation can be insured. The feasibility of the plan has been discussed before and was allowed to drop on account of the fuel question, fuel on the desert being too expensive to allow of a reasonable freight tariff. That question can now be satisfactorily solved by the use of oil shipped to Mojave and distributed along the route in storage tanks. This line would not only be a great benefit to the merchants but it would also give an outlet, at a reasonable price, to the products of the county, which have at the present time to be handled in the county or allowed to rot on the ground. The benefit therefore from such a proposition as the Merchants & Manufacturers Association makes to the people of Owens valley, not only effects the merchants of this part of the county, but every producer within distance of a town which can insure the necessary amount of compensation to bring the traction line within his territory. If the merchants get together and push this good thing along, there will be benefits from three points that we can swear to.

1. The merchants themselves.
2. The producers of the valley.
3. Last but not least, the necessary competition will be established which will force the "octopus" to not only throw out its feelers, but actually fill the gap that will give Northern Inyo a market for its products.

P. S. The traction line can always be continued until the "octopus" comes down to decent rates and fares.

Organize a Club.

The Mt. Whitney club is going to be organized. A number of gentlemen who have made that delightful trip express a desire to see such an organization formed and everybody, man, woman or child, who has been to the top of the mountain will be eligible to membership. Postal cards will be mailed in a few days announcing the date and place of the first meeting. It is the intention to admit to membership those who will agree to make the trip this year and all such will be invited to join after the organization is perfected.—Tulare Times.

Would it not be well for our people to form a mountain club and co-operate with clubs of like character? Nearly all of our citizens have viewed the wonderful sceneries of the Sierra Nevadas, and are well acquainted with the numerous trails and camping places in the mountains. By corresponding with the different clubs, and explaining to them our nearness to the mountains and the ease and short length of time it takes to reach the coveted mountain resorts, there is no doubt but there would be an interest created in our home scenery and be the means of numerous summer tourists coming to this side of the mountains before commencing the trip to the higher Sierras. From Independence, Lone Pine, Big Pine or Bishop, it is less than a day's ride to some of the most favored camping and fishing grounds in the whole range. There is plenty of feed for pack and riding animals at all the camping grounds. The scenery at all the camping places is grand and the fishing unexcelled. Get a move on, and see what can be done toward organizing a club.

Death of George Storey.

Last Monday morning the District Attorney received a telegram announcing the death of George Storey at the State Hospital at Stockton, and asking instructions as to burial.

George Storey was a man well and favorably known in this county for the past twenty years. Born in New York a little more than 70 years ago, he came to the west as a young man, and engaged in mining. It was he that made the big deal on the Standard Mine at Bodie, and by the sale of that mine realized a snug fortune. He came to Bishop about 20 years ago, and since that time has operated the Poleta mine near there, with varying fortune. For the past two years his health and mind had both been giving way and to his friends and acquaintances his dissolution seemed inevitable, yet the ending of his life in poverty, with his other misfortune is lamentable indeed.

In a letter from J. Sub Johnson, of Visalia, he states he will shortly leave for Cape Nome, Alaska. Sub's many friends in this vicinity hope that he will strike it rich and soon return a multi-millionaire.

Lester Laird came in from the Minnietta mine last Tuesday. Lester is somewhat under the weather, but the ozone and tender solicitude he receives will soon effect a cure.

Sheep are coming in lively. About 12,000 have already been counted and sheep-license tax collected.

J. White Smith, Esq., of Bishop, was a visitor in Independence for a day or so during the week.

The Independence public school will close to-day.

OUR SOUTHERN FRIENDS

Would Visit Us—But!!

The trip by train from Los Angeles to Citrus is long and tedious, the trip by stage from Mojave to Keeler is as near Hades as any of us good fellows (male or female are liable to get, unless for some unknown cause we should be forced to trek to Arizona. It will be easily understood from the foregoing remarks that even under the most advantageous circumstances the trip by stage from the windy town (Mojave not Chicago) is one which a long suffering public attempts only at the call of business, and the business must be of a somewhat pressing nature at that. The main features of the stage line as run at the present time are: Insufficient accommodations with regard to the stage itself, which is invariably loaded down with hay, grain and freight independent of the number of passengers or the length of their legs. The worst meals that were ever put before hungry passengers at the small sum of 50 cents per meal, the worst lot of old skates in the shape of horse flesh for traction purposes, poor, balky and half starved, and last but not least, the cheapest lot of drivers, who were never "known to refuse," that ever graced the off side of a garbage wagon. It would seem probable that the climax of disgust had been reached by passengers on every trip the aforesaid stage had ever taken, but from the report of two young ladies who lately arrived from the south the record has been broken into small pieces.

The stage started from Mojave, April 23rd with 3 passengers, in charge of a man whose appetite for Mojave fire water had been duly appeased before starting, and the result was in pushing on the lines he lost his balance, reached the ground in good order, but unfortunately pulled the horses around and broke the pole out of the stage. Was'nt it lucky he was not hurt? It is perhaps as well to mention here that this outfit carries the United States mail. After a return had been made to Mojave and the damage repaired a safe trip was made to the 18-mile-house, at which one of the ladies was heard to whisper, "Thank God!" After a change of horses had been made, and an increase of four passengers, the next driver who took charge was kindness itself—even allowing the male passengers to get out and walk up the hills and over the particularly sandy stretches, as far as Little Lake. The third and last driver made things particularly interesting by showing visible signs of insanity. After about one mile had been traversed with this driver, one of the ladies was heard to remark, "Non compos mentis," and she was right. The stage is due at Keeler at 4.30 p. m., being a trip from Mojave of 120 miles, and is supposed to take 23 hours. On this trip it arrived at 1:30 a. m. with its 7 passengers in a stage which fills up with 5 besides the driver, and the young lady was speechless.

Verdict of Coroner's Jury.

We, the undersigned, the jurors summoned to appear before A. V. Davidson, J. P., acting Coroner of said Inyo county, State of California, at black rocks near the Eight-mile house, in said county and State, the 15th day of April, 1901, to inquire as to the identity of the person whose remains were found at said last mentioned place, and as to the time, place and circumstances attending his death, having been duly sworn according to law, and having made such inquisition, and after considering the testimony adduced herein, upon our oaths, each and all do say, that we find the deceased was named Manuel Arambula, that he was a native of California, aged about 19 years. That he came to his death in said County of Inyo, State of California, on or about the 1st day of January, 1899, from the effects of a gunshot wound received at Black Rocks in said County and State; that said wound was inflicted by intentional shooting, done with malice aforethought, by some person or persons to this jury unknown.

All of which we certify by this inquisition in writing by us.

Signed this 20th day of April, 1901.

Death of a Pioneer Woman.

Mrs. Albert Halverson died at Big Pine last Tuesday morning at half-past three from the effects of a paralytic stroke received the evening before as she was milking. She was carried into the house and a doctor summoned immediately, but the unfortunate woman never regained consciousness and passed away at the hour named. She came to Inyo county in the early 60's and has lived here ever since. Mrs. Halverson was a good wife, a kind neighbor and an affectionate mother, and her loss will be sorely felt by a large number of relatives and a host of friends and acquaintances. She leaves a husband, and eight children by a former marriage, to mourn her demise. She was a native of Germany and aged about 63 years.

Earned the Dog.

A minister was one day walking along a road, and to his astonishment he saw a crowd of boys sitting in front of a ring with a small dog in the center. When he came up to them he put the following question: "What are you doing to the dog?" One little boy said. "Whoever tells the biggest lie wins it." "Oh," said the minister, "I am surprised at you little boys, for when I was like you I never told lies." There was silence for a while, until one of the boys shouted, "Hand him the dog."

Tax-Collector Given informs us that the second installment of taxes are coming in rapidly, and judging from present outlook the delinquent list will be small.

Don't forget the dance to-night.

One Claim Enough.

It is not deemed well to locate and try to hold several thousand feet of mining ground. A miner who has too much is worse than land poor, because it takes about all his time and money to keep up the annual assessment work required by law. On this plan not one of the claims can be properly developed, and only a little gophering done at all. By concentrating the labor on one, or even two, claims something worth while can be accomplished. Purchasers are shy of prospects which have been held several years by assessment work only, but if they see that a miner has really made an effort to open one it gives an idea of value to the claim, making it more salable. Men sometimes want to take whatever mining ground is in sight, arguing that if 1500 on a ledge is good to have 6000 is much better. Experience has proved the fallacy of this idea. Fifteen hundred feet is the length of a single lode claim allowed to an individual by the Government, and it is usually as much as one can well handle. It is better to have a real mine on that much ground than a dozen mere locations on four times as much. A piece of mining property moderately well opened is of some value to the owner, whereas a dozen prospects with 10 or 15-foot shafts amount to little. Such locations cannot be sold and they bring no profit to the owner, while requiring certain work each year to retain legal ownership.—Mining and Scientific Press.

MarsNall's Absentmindedness.

One day Judge Marshall, engrossed in his reflections, was driving over the wretched roads of North Carolina on his way to Raleigh in a stick gig. His horse turned out of the road, and the sulky ran over a sapling and was tilted so as to arouse the judge. When he found that he could move neither to right nor left, an old negro, who had come along, solved the difficulty.

"My old marster," he asked, "what fer you don't back your horse?"

"That's true," said the judge, and he acted as advised. Thanking his deliverer heartily, he felt in his pocket for some change, but he did not have any.

"Never mind, old man," he said. "I shall stop at the tavern and leave some money for you with the landlord."

The old negro was not impressed with the stranger, but he called at the tavern and asked the keeper if an old gentleman had left anything there for him.

"Oh, yes," said the landlord, "he left a silver dollar for you. What do you think of that old gentleman?"

The negro gazed at the dollar and said:

"He was a gem'man, for sho', but"—patting his forehead—"he didn't have much in here."—World's Work.

Tough Old English Statesmen.

In Macaulay's day English statesmen were of a hardier and more robust type than the present race of politicians. They seem to have had cast iron nerves and appetites and digestions to match. They dined off a huge beefsteak and a bottle of port, while their grandsons are content with cutlet and a lemon squash. And yet they lived to a good old age. We hear of Lord Brougham at the age of 70 "drinking two bottles of port at dinner, going to bed upon half a bottle of peat reek (whisky) and turning out at daylight to shoot teal;" and Lord Lyndhurst at the age of 90 "supping off hot boiled lobster and champagne."

Mr. Kinnear, an old parliamentary hand, tells us that he remembers seeing "Mr. Disraeli drinking, as the prelude to a big speech, a pint of port wine at the buffet in the commons lobby, dressed in a green coat, a buff waistcoat and snuff colored trousers." This seems a modest potation under the circumstances, but Mr. Kinnear adds that Disraeli came back and had another pint later on.—Blackwood's

PERPETUAL-MOTION MACHINE.

Exhibit at Paris Exposition Seemingly Answers All Requirements.

At the Paris exposition was a very curious exhibit in the form of a clock which attracted much attention from visitors. It was placed in a glass case to protect its delicate working parts from meddlers. It was self-moving and it ran two months during the exposition without stopping and without having been wound up by any outside force surreptitiously. There was no reason why it should have stopped, says Electricity, for it was a true form of perpetual movement—within the limit, however, of the wearing out of its mechanism.

Its inventor was enabled to obtain these results by very ingeniously combining a system of levers, or hinged residual magnetic armatures, which moved a wheel continuously around its axis for the purpose of winding up a spring, consequently the clock was only an accessory, for the apparatus could be used for other purposes and the construction of the wheel or moving mechanism alone contains the interesting features of the invention.

There are two circles composed of levers which are placed on the two side faces of the rim of a large wheel. These two sets of levers form an angle of 45 degrees with each other, and at their outer ends counterweights are attached to the longer arm of each lever. From the start we conclude that the counterweights on the side farthest from the center of the wheel would give a preponderating turning force to the wheel, causing it to turn with a circular movement.

The wheel makes four turns per minute, and its movement is regulated by a centrifugal governor put in motion through an endless chain.

When the wheel in its movement brings the short arm of one of the levers, which may be called an armature, to the face of the pulley the phenomenon of magnetic repulsion takes place, which causes the long arm of the lever with the counterweight to rise to a vertical position, while the further motion of the wheel causes it to fall to the other side from the vertical position, thus making it add its weight to each of the others which have preceded it to keep the wheel in motion.

The motion of the wheel is transmitted to the clock spring through a pinion placed on the axle which meshes into a toothed wheel, which at its center has an endless screw acting on another smaller wheel, whose axle pinion rests on the wheel of the drum which winds up the spring.

Woes of a New Member.

Wall street gossip has attributed the palm for hard luck to a recently elected member of the Stock Enchange who purchased a lot of valuable experience at a very high price. He paid nearly $50,000 for his seat, and although he was not well versed in the business done on the floor he plunged into it with a courage commensurate to his ignorance. He misunderstood his orders and he neglected occasionally to make a memorandum of his sales. When he found that a customer had asked him to sell a certain stock instead of buy it, as he had done, he tried to make good his losses from his blunder by taking a small gamble on his own account. Business on the Stock Exchange is done in a rush in these days, and the man who hesitates or who is slow-witted finds himself outclassed. This new member at the end of his first month on the exchange balanced up his business and found that his losses due to his own blunders in executing orders for his customers had cost him nearly $50,000. Wall street is now speculating as to whether or not this broker is going to demonstrate that his experience was worth the money.—New York Sun.

Eugenie's Prescience.

The ex-Empress Eugenie received a part of her education at a ladies' school in Clifton, England, where she made herself a general favorite, for she was then one of the most beautiful girls in Europe. An old schoolmate tells the following story of those days: The girls, to amuse themselves on half-holiday, dressed up to act charades. Mlle. De Montijo, with a tinsel crown on her head and a faded brocade curtain fastened to her dress to do duty as a train, personated a queen. An enthusiastic friend, struck with her beauty, set off by those unaccustomed gauds, exclaimed: "You look just like a queen. You ought to be a queen!" "Perhaps I shall be some day—who knows?" answered Eugenie, impressively. The girls laughed derisively. "You laugh now. But who knows?" persisted the future empress. "Josephine became empress of the French, and she was only a simple creole lady, and I, at any rate, am descended from kings. Who knows?"

Her Sweet Ingenuousness.

"Charley, dear," said young Mrs. Torkins, "I am going to turn over a new leaf."

"In what connection?"

"I'm going to quit being superstitious. I have always disliked to begin anything on Friday."

"Yes. It is very silly of you."

"Well, your arguments have convinced me. You know that new dress I was making to you about?"

"Y-yes."

"Well, I'm going to start out and buy the material on Friday, just to show I'm not afraid."—Washington Star.

We have an idea that a woman has to be unselfish to live comfortably through that period when her sons prefer young girls to her, and her husband begins to take his daughters out and leave her at home.

A MAYOR'S MIRACLE.

He Made the Blind See, the Deaf Hear and the Lame Walk.

From the many anecdotes of Bampfylde Moore Carew's rogueries in Arthur Montefiore Brice's essay on that "Amazing Vagabond" we quote one in which Carew and his gypsy crew who had rigged themselves up as cripples and gathered at Bridgewater fair to plunder the junketers came off second best.

When the mayor of Bridgewater heard that this motley group of cripples had arrived, he announced to some of his friends that he was possessed of a power they perhaps little suspected—that, in fact, he could make the blind see, the deaf hear and the lame walk. Bets were freely made that he could do nothing of the kind, and thereupon the mayor had the gypsies arrested and immediately brought before him and, after hearing their harrowing tales, ordered them to be confined for the night in the lockup.

About 10 o'clock at night, however, the municipal surgeon entered with a lantern and announced that he would examine them all in the morning in order to report to the mayor whether or not they really suffered from deformity of one kind or another, and he went on to say that those who were found to be impostors would be treated by the mayor with severity so extreme that, moved to pity, he would allow any such misguided wretch to escape there and then from the lockup on condition that he immediately left the town.

At this intelligence a great commotion arose, and in less time than it takes to write it the whole crowd surged out of the lockup, flinging away their crutches and wooden legs, patches and bandages, and made off down the town at topmost speed, the blind leading the way with unerring steps, the dumb crying aloud their fears, the deaf replying to them, and the lame sprinting along at a rattling pace. Now, just opposite the lockup, on the farther side of the street, stood the witty mayor and his friends, convulsed with laughter at the success of his scheme.—Argonaut.

CATCHING CICADAS.

How Certain Malays Obtain a Curious Delicacy.

Certain natives of the Malay peninsula catch cicadas and eat them and that as a considerable luxury. To eat a cicada seems distinctly curious, says the London Daily Mail, when we reflect that this insect is in reality a glorified member of that insect group which contains as its most prominent representative the diminutive and swarthy creature which shall be nameless here for evermore.

The way in which the Siamese proceeds was related to the Zoological society the other day by a naturalist who has spent some time in the Malay peninsula observing men as well as insects. At night, when these insects fly, the native sallies forth armed with a torch and but little raiment. The torch is deposited in a convenient place, and the swarm of natives proceed to clap their hands in a perfectly regular fashion so as to produce a considerable sound.

It is the combination of light and sound that allures the cicada from its haunts to its destruction. The insects come also in swarms and settle upon the bodies of the applauding natives, whence they are easily detached, preserved, cooked and eaten.

The Greek sage remarked that happy are the cicadas in that they have voiceless wives. It is apparently the lady cicadas who are attracted by what they fondly believe to be the love cry of the male and are thus lured to their fate by that most dangerous of passions.

Mother—That gentleman seems very attentive to you, Clara. What sort of a young man do you find him?

Clara—Oh, he seems all right, but a little empty, perhaps.

Mother (who always takes things literally)—My dear Clara, what a very shocking remark. I know he was very ill the first few days out, but fancy noticing such a thing.—Pick-Me-Up.

Even the highest personages in Turkey are not exempt from suspicion. Their movements are watched and reported to the palace by an army of spies who swarm in every quarter.

SORES AND ULCERS.

Sores and Ulcers never become chronic unless the blood is in poor condition—is sluggish, weak and unable to throw off the poisons that accumulate in it. The system must be relieved of the unhealthy matter through the sore, and great danger to life would follow should it heal before the blood has been made pure and healthy and all impurities eliminated from the system. S.S.S. begins the cure by first cleansing and invigorating the blood, building up the general health and removing from the system all morbid, effete matter. A CONSTANT DRAIN UPON THE SYSTEM. When this has been accomplished the discharge gradually ceases, and the sore or ulcer heals. It is the tendency of these old indolent sores to grow worse and worse, and eventually to destroy the bones. Local applications, while soothing and to some extent alleviate pain, cannot reach the seat of the trouble. S. S. S. does, and no matter how apparently hopeless your condition, even though your constitution has broken down, it will bring relief when nothing else can. It supplies the rich, pure blood necessary to heal the sore and nourish the debilitated, diseased body.

Mr. J. B. Talbert, Lock Box 245, Winona, Miss., says: "Six years ago my leg from the knee to the foot was one solid sore. Several physicians treated me and I made two trips to Hot Springs, but found no relief. I was induced to try S. S. S., and it made a complete cure. I have been a perfectly well man ever since."

SSS is the only purely vegetable blood purifier known—contains no poisonous minerals to ruin the digestion and add to, rather than relieve your sufferings. If your flesh does not heal readily when scratched, bruised or cut, your blood is in bad condition, and any ordinary sore is apt to become chronic.

Betraying Buckles.

General Duhesme was a distinguished French veteran, slain by the Prussians after the rout of Waterloo. He was full of resource and had great skill and presence of mind. At Pescara, when he was in great danger, a large fortress in front and a savage insurrection in his rear, his own common sense saved him.

"Who commands at Pescara?" he asked a soldier.

"There are two."

"What is the grade of the chief in command?"

"A brigadier general."

"His name?"

"De Pietramaggiore."

"His title?"

"A marquis."

"His age?"

"About 70."

"Is he well preserved? Does he keep his color?"

"He is thin and pallid."

"Is his voice strong and manly?"

"It is weak and dull."

"Is he lively, gay?"

"Neither the one nor the other."

"What does he wear on his head?"

"He is powdered, and his hair is done in locks."

"Has he boots and spurs?"

"No; he wears silk stockings, shoes and great buckles."

"Great buckles!" cried Duhesme. "Bring up the guns and begin firing! The place is mine!"

An Excuse For a Pardon.

When the stern Duke of Wellington was prime minister under George IV, he managed the old monarch easily enough, but when he attempted the same tactics with the young Queen Victoria he met his match. She constantly outwitted him. One of his earliest official acts was to bring before her a court martial death sentence which he expected her to sign as a matter of course. A soldier was to be executed for desertion, and as the death warrant was placed before the queen by the duke she raised her eyes, full of tears, to his face, saying:

"Have you nothing to say in behalf of this poor man?"

"Nothing," said the duke, standing at attention like one of his own privates; "he has deserted three times."

"Oh, your grace, think again," pleaded the queen as if she were asking for the life of her dearest friend.

"Well, your majesty, he certainly is a bad soldier, but there was somebody who spoke for his good character. He may be a tolerably good fellow in civil life."

"Oh, thank you," said the queen in heartfelt tones, and before the astonished duke could utter a word of protest she had written across the paper the word "Pardoned."

Ants That Fight Spiders.

Few more wonderful adaptations are seen in the whole round of nature than the webs spiders spin to entrap the wary ant. They are not high hung, lacy affairs, caressing every breeze, but low set, silken tubes stretched in the grass, the crevices of rock or about tree roots. Ants of every size creep heedlessly into them. The spiders eat them with relish, but occasionally a very little spider and a very big ant engage in a duel to the death. If the spider can bite, the ant can sting, and does it with a right good will. The spider does not try to get rid of such an ant as he does of a wasp or bee too strong to be safely attacked. Such an insect, which threatens destruction to the web, is often cut out of it by the web builders. The entangling cables are not loosed, but the web rays neatly snipped in two, first those underneath and at the very last the highest filament. Often the letting go of such a captive means destruction to half the nest. But some spiders are wiser than some people. They know not merely when they have enough, but when they have too much.

An Epitaph.

In the churchyard of Leigh, near Bolton, will be found a tombstone bearing the following amazing sentence: "A virtuous woman is 5s. to her husband." The explanation seems to be that space prevented "a crown" being cut in full, and the stonemason argued that a crown equals 5s.—Notes and Queries.

HEALD'S BUSINESS COLLEGE.

A Prosperous and Popular San Francisco Institution.

Among the institutions identified with the growth and development of San Francisco Heald's Business College holds a conspicuous place. Both as a business enterprise and an educational institution it has been ever since its organization, nearly forty years ago, extremely popular and eminently successful. It is in the class of those solid and substantial institutions in which a city takes pride. Citizens point to it as one of the old reliable and thoroughly progressive establishments, an institution with a definite purpose and an unquestioned status.

In connection with commercial education the name of Heald's is a household word on the Pacific Coast and throughout the country at large. In its own field of effort it is as widely known as Stanford or Berkeley, for it enrolls students from the four quarters of the globe. In 1899 every county in California but four had students in Heald's Business College. The four not represented were Del Norte, Lassen, Orange and Ventura. The register of the college shows that in 1900 students were enrolled from the following States and Territories outside of California; in many cases there were several representatives from each: Nevada, Iowa, Washington, Oregon, Montana, Colorado, Utah, Idaho, Arizona, Kansas, Missouri, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Virginia and New Mexico. In 1900 students came directly to the school from Mexico, Canada, Japan, the Hawaiian Islands, Yukon Territory, Siberia and Central America. Enrollments were also made from England and Sweden.

Its large body of alumni constitute a most formidable promoting force, and the steady growth of the college can be attributed largely to the commending voice of these thousands of graduates, who know whereof they speak.

For full information write to the college for the 80-page catalogue and college journals.

CLEANLY WOMAN.

Erroneously Thinks By Scouring Her Scalp That She Cures Dandruff.

Cleanly woman has an erroneous idea that by scouring the scalp, which removes the dandruff scales, she is curing the dandruff. She may wash her scalp every day, and yet have dandruff her life long, accompanied by falling hair, too. The only way in the world to cure dandruff is to kill the dandruff germ, and there is no hair preparation that will do that but Newbro's Herpicide. I KISSED THE COOK.

I kissed the cook. Ah, me! She was divine—
Cheeks peachy, dark-brown eyes, lips red as wine;
Long apron with a bow,
A cap as white as snow,
By far too tempting, so I kissed the cook.

I kissed the cook, this angel from the skies,
And yet I did not take her by surprise.
'Twas mean, I will allow,
But if you'll make the vow
To keep it, I'll tell you how I kissed the cook.

I kissed the cook. Poor, helpless little lass—
The chance so good I could not let it pass.
Her hands were in the dough,
She dare not spoil, you know,
My Sunday suit, and so I kissed the cook.

I kissed the cook. I might have been more strong,
But then I guess it wasn't very wrong,
For just 'tween you and me,
The cook's my wife, is she;
So I'd a right, you see, to kiss the cook.

"WEEDS."

I.

SNIPEY and Kipper stood in the dock, with a don't-care-a-fig-for-anybody air.

"What's the charge against these fellows?" inquired the magistrate.

"Drunk and disorderly, your worship, and assaulting the police."

There was no defense.

"Any previous convictions?" asked his worship, with a sour look at the two youths of promise.
